

HISTORY OF EUROPE

FROM THE COMMENCEMENT

OF THE

RENCH REVOLUTION

IN M.DCC.LXXXIX.

TO THE RESTORATION OF THE BOURBONS

IN M.DCCC.XV.

BY ARCHIBALD ALISON, F.R.S.E.

ADVOCATE.

"Bellum maxime omnium memorabile quæ unquam gesta sint me scripturum; quod Hannibale duce Carthaginienses cum populo Romano gessere. Nam neque validiores opibus ullæ inter se civitates gentesque contulerunt arma, neque his ipsis tantum unquam virium aut roboris fuit: et haud ignotas belli artes inter se, sed expertas primo Punico conserebant bello; odlis etiam prope majoribus certarunt quam viribus; et adeo, varia belli fortuna, ancepsque Mars fuit, ut propius periculum fuerint qui vicerunt."—Tir. Liv. lib. 21.

VOL. IX.

PARIS,

BAUDRY'S EUROPEAN LIBRARY,
3, QUAI MALAQUAIS, NEAR THE PONT DES ARTS;
AND STASSIN ET XAVIER, 9, RUE DU COQ.

SOLD ALSO BY AMYOT, RUE DE LA PAIX; TRUCHY, BOULEVARD DES ITALIENS; BROCKHAUS AND AVENARIUS, RUE RICHELIEU; LEOPOLD MICHELSEN, LEIPZIG; AND BY ALL THE PRINCIPAL BOOKSELLERS ON THE CONTINENT.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME IX.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

RUSSIA AND FRANCE AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE FINAL STRUGGLE.

Statistical Account of Russia—Its Extent, Climate, and Physical Resources—Character of its People and Government—Military and Naval Establishments of the Empire—Military Cossacks and Nomad Tribes—Its Diplomacy, National Religion, Political System of Government, and Foreign Conquests—Napoléon's Arrival at Paris after the Russian Campaign, and First Measures on coming there—Conspiracy of Mallet—Its Origin, Progress, Early Success, and Overthrow—Arrangement of the Differences of Napoléon with the Pope—Concordat of 1813—Statistical Details of France in 1813—Military Strength of the Empire—Its Finances and Commerce, and Effect of the Conscription on the Physical Strength of the Nation—Napoléon's Last Measures for the Approaching Campaign—Seizure of the Properties of the Communities and Public Hospitals for the Treasury.—P. 1—52.

CHAPTER LXIX.

RESURRECTION OF GERMANY.

Immense Sensation produced in the North of Germany by the Moscow Campaign—Convention of General D'York—Advance of the Russians to Berlin, and Declaration of War by Prussia against France—Negotiations with Austria and the other European Powers—Preparations of Prussia for the War—Opening of the Campaign by Napoléon in Germany—Battle of Lutzen, and Retreat of the Allies to Dresden—Final Adherence of Saxony to Napoléon—Passage of the Elbe, and Advance of the French to Bautzen—Desperate Battle there, and Retreat of the Allies—Armistice of Pleswitz, and Important Partizan Operations in the Rear of the French at this Period.—P. 53—133.

· CHAPTER LXX.

FROM THE ARMISTICE OF PLESWITZ TO THE RENEWAL OF THE WAR.

Political, Moral, and Private Character of Napoléon—Ancedotes of his Political, Moral, and Private Life—Characters of Murat, Ney, and Berthier—Negotiations with Austria, and final Accession of that Power to the Coalition—Preparations of both Parties for the approaching Campaign—Plans of the Campaign on the part of the Allies and of the French—Characters of Blucher, Bernadotte, Gueisenau, Schwartzenberg, Metternich—Arrival of Moreau in Europe, and appointment of Schwartzenberg to the Supreme Command.—P. 134—210.

CHAPTER LXXI.

DELIVERANCE OF GERMANY.

Spirit of the French Revolution, and causes of its Overthrow—First operations of Napoléon in Silesia—Advance of the Allies against Dresden, and Battle round that eity—Their subsequent Retreat into Bohemia—Battles of Culm, Gross-Beren, the Katzbach, and Dennewitz

11

—Subsequent operations of Napoléon on the Dateman frontier—Subsequent Retreat fred Dreades—Battle of Leopie, and decuses overthere of the Freech—Retreat of Napoléon to the filme—Battle of Hannay, and fastace of the Filme of the French troop-hopestions against Dreaden, and surrebiler of St.-Cyr there—Capture of Stefan and Terryau—Steps and Capture of Dantie—Insurrection to Holland, and retries of the French his Dinders— Operations of the Austrana against the French in Italy—Retreat of the Latter behind the Attre-Reflections on three subschilding results—7 211—511

CHAPTER LXXIII

STATE OF THE PENISOLA AT THE COUNTRIEST OF THE YEAR

Journey of Wellington to Cadia, and his appointment as Command via Chief of the Spin as Army—Democratic protections of the Contract Cadia, and present states as the thirt with the way of the procession of the Contract—Commencement of the Campaign, and mark of the Alteed Army to Vitoria—Laille of Vitoria, and test excettlenes of the 1 trends—Operations in the east of from and Patiefoctation—Ideacord the Printic theoretic in the Printice—Commencement of the Size, and Strapanon—His thropion into Spin, and Patiefoct in the Printice—Commencement of the Size, and Strapanon—His thropion into Spin, and Patiefoct in the Printice—Commencement of the Size, and Strapanon—His testing and Alter Assaulten—Patiegram of the Bilasson—Usoscensial Operations in the fast of Spin and state of the Patiefock of the Size of the

HISTORY OF EUROPE

FROM THE COMMENCEMENT

OF THE

FRENCH REVOLUTION.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

RUSSIA AND FRANCE AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE FINAL STRUGGLE.

ARGUMENT.

Slow but Steady Growth of the Russian Empire—Analogy in this respect of the Physical and Moral World-Extent and Statistics of the Russian Empire-Surprizing Variety of Climate and Extent of Latitude in Russia-Luxuriant Riches of the Crimea and Southern Provinces -Capabilities of Russia for future increase-Vast Extent and Capabilities of Asiatic Russia -Future Capabilities of Siberia-Character of the People, and their universal thirst for Conquest-Universal Belief among them that Russia is one day to Conquer the World-Rank depends on Military Employment or the Emperor's Gift-Military Spirit at the Imperial Palace-Its General Adoption through the Empire-Universality of Decorations to all persons in Civil and Military employments-Military force of the Empire-Its Revenues, and Small Cost of the Army-Slavery of the Peasantry-Mode of Levying the Troops-Military Colonies-The Cossaeks-Their Territory, Character, and Manners-Description of the Urkaine, and the Character of its Inhabitants-Incredible Devastation of the Tartar Tribes in Southern Russia in former times-Origin of the Cossacks among these disasters-Influence of the Victories in Germany and France on the Cossaeks-Their Appearance and Manners-Their Mode of Fighting and Habits in War-Naval Forces of Russia-General Disinclination of the Nation to the Navy-Want of Coal in the Empire, and its important Effects-Venality of Justice in the Russian Dominions-Their Great ability in Diplomacy-Universal Corruption which pervades Inferior Functionaries—Efficacy of the Secret Police and of the Emperor's Vengeance-Evils and Dangers of this System-Extraordinary Influence of Religion in Russia-State of the Church and the Clergy-Peculiar Political System of the Russian Cabinet-Its immense Physical Advantages for such a System-Successive Conquests of the Russians in their Early History-Their Progress in Later Times-Napoleon's Account of the Power of Russia-Description of St.-Petersburg-Its Public Edifices -Importance of the Sketch of Russia-Arrival of Nopoleon at the Tuileries-Universal Consternation at Paris on the News of the Retreat and the Emperor's Arrival being received -Restoration of Public Confidence throughout the Empire-Conspiracy of Malet-Progress of the Conspiracy-Its extraordinary Success-Boldness of Malet, who Seizes the Governor of Paris-His subsequent Seizure and Overthrow-Effect which this Conspiracy produced in Paris and on Napoléon-His Opinions on the Subject in the Council of State-Reflections on this Event-Decree concerning the French Regency-Napoleon arranges his Differences with the Church-Ilis hidden Designs regarding the Pope and the Catholic Church-His Plans for making Paris its Head-Commencement of the Conferences with the Pope at Fontainebleau-Articles of the Concordat-Extraordinary Joy of Napoleon at the Conclusion of this Treaty-Rapid Changes in the Opinion of the Pope and his Council-Moderate and Prudent Conduct of Napoléon on his Retractation-His Reasons for this Mederation-Napoléon's Speech to the Legislative Body-Important Statistical Details with which it was Accompanied-Surprizing magnitude of the Sums expended by Napoléon on Public Improvements-Finances of the French Empire at this Period-Military Strength of the

1

.

Empire, and of its Nary-Dangers with which it threatened the Proton I disting-Remarkable Fadors of the Powers of the Consert tion at this Proton-Ferons of National American Committee Domination in the key and Star and of Highly I required it the large at the Revolutionary Wars advanced—Great Lowers of the Proposition of the Large at the Computationary Wars advanced—Great Lowers of the Proposition of the Computation of the Related Dangers—Forces thus Collected by Napoleon for the Computationary of the Pathological Committee for the Public Treasury—Fadors of these formoral Wayars and the Large Taylor ton—Lasting Interest of this Expuse of the Fapors of Napoleon—World West-res of the Empire, not with that done they are more of the Empire by Napoleon—World West-res of the Empire, not with that done they are more of Pathological Resource.

Slow but steady prowth of the Russing Empire THE RESSIAN EMPIRE, which had thus repelled the most formulable armament ever arrayed against the liberties of mankin l. and defeated the whole forces of Western I urope, led by the most consummate commander of modern times, is a state of such vast strength and boundless resources, that it is obviously destined to make a great and listing impression on human affairs. Its progress has been allow; but it is only on that account the more likely to be durable. It has not suddenly risen to greatness-like the empires of Alexander in ancient, or Napol ton in modern times -from the force of individual genius, or the accident of casual fortune. Let has slowly advanced and been bruily consolidated during a succession of area. from the combined influence of ambition Salfully directed, and energy terseveringly applied. It received its greatest development from the breach fley olution-the experience acquired, and the spirit called forth dury zithe contest for its existence, doubled its power; and the cloud which is thatherts overshadoned in obscure and gloomy grandout the north of burnte, row emerged, like the genic in the eastern fable, an armed grant, from the election of Nanolcon.

the made thousand follow all f empire if as p. 1 fong emoppress to of legal to eerdatatum of grantle and adolescence, that if emeasure of future tratuitity and decar is to be found. Experience genres that this is not a mere forcef it at at us, or & greated by the abelous resemblance of the growths fer amand on had all we single men, but a fixed law of rature-a part of that reversi us on to of design which runs through every part of ereate n, and ther for guiter the minutest of ject in the material, withit can'tim est a mt miture in the maral world live compare the winzel inwet, which men' littageri water a with the first rays of the summ er s sun, and runs if to " fish by . Int se to at existence left or liverist er set in the west, with the majority growth of the a be which bet of his commerce restorante everytene fres at the relongabr, and stands fi sthiaf er the lay enfacten centur en an ilme " iref gempant of it wellen timemmer at all are a fiente lima en ef to an achon era ifer relieunt lebichit rant ierast erreieff et contait mite, teen m led for exert contrated with their to date of paragramtical time a same of effects and four-sade products to meaning the fact that a same to be seen to be advancent, its of at me comes it a. m. impre enterit from the species a timeresolf at the restaure to

Treated Montestert and first to of the first as design or a time of a common of age of the office of the south, immense steppes of verdant turf afferd rich pasturage, even to the foot of the Caucavian snows: while in the southern extremity of the Crimes. along the southern front of the Taurida range, the chimate hardly differt from the opposite shores of Apatolia and Asia Minor, Winter at there hardly felt; the primrose and the crocus appear above the earth in the month of January, and the oak retains its green foliage through the whole year; the ever-verdant laurel grows beside the olive, the fig, and the date-tree, bre gight in former times to these mountains by the Greek colonists; the walnut, the peach, the nectarine, and apricot, flouredt in the hanging woods, or ratter natural gardens, in the valleys; the wild vine reaches the tops of the birbest trees, and descending again to the ground, forms, with the vibranian, festoons and carlands. " High hills, masses of rock, streams and estaracts, serdant fields and woods, and the sea that bounds the landscape, render the scene," says l'allas, " equal to any imagined or descril ed by the poets. The summle life of the good Tartars, their cottages cut in the solid rock, and concealed by the thick foliage of the surrounding gardens; the flute of the show herd, his flocks scattered on solitars hills, remind the traveller of the robler age. The traveller leaves the people with regret, and environ the design of mortals ignorant of war, the frauds of trade, and luxury accompanied with all its vices (1)."

Conditions The productive powers of a country of such extent, an Iso diverity of the such extent of the such extends of the such extent of the s perhaps not force !

41.

The pertaining the whole empire, in Asia as well as Forope, at present (181) about usity of a nearly manufactured the of these spaces are first to act, a pearly in omean incredible, when the predictor extent of fertile for I at I menditurated it taken into consideration, as I the corresponding and will now ray I i increase of the Arabo-Saton race in the strategies of the Arabo Arabing ment is required to decentrate the same bery which these two great families of marking that a quarterly extend the first who factor have committed to the committee of the arabon factors.

heaven Borninings so hast, the error of tear them, but it appear out to contain the present of the present of the or east. In the east and and are, they are I would be all to all on every sent on the earth of the east of t of the man to Survey the most to to to to the the test of the to the test of t

There was a second of the state of the state

S La Kirbach B ... Serbin and general in Bayloung Style and Serbing B ... Serbin Serbing B ... Serbin Serbing Serbin B ... Serbin Bayloung ... Serbin and ... Serbin and ...

material to the department of the second of

A No. I'm a repose that N max. In Significant of the max of the Significant of the Signif

From Sic.

Sin South or Box So. V. C. of Long. Or.

South and Sic. V. So. V. C.

Europe, is the unseen spring which both retains them sal missise under the standards of their chief, and impels their accumulated force in ceaseless a !vance over all the adjoining states. The energies of the people, great as the territory they inhabit, are never wasted in internal disputes, domestic grievances, how great socrer, are overlooked in the thirst for f reign aggrandice ment; in the conquest of the world the people hope to fir 12 commensation. and more than a compensation, for all the erils of their internal a immistration. Revolutions of the most sielent kind have frequently occurred in the palace, and the order of succession, as in all eastern dyratics, has I sent on turned aside by the bloody hand of the assissing but no repul bear so felt has ever animated any considerable part of the copulation. Il excors who returned from Paris in 181%, brought with them a strong a lowesting f r itinstitutions of Western Furape, and a large part of the efficers who led it a victorious armies of Alexander, were engaged I r ten years afterwards in a dark conspiracy, which embittere I the last days, and perhaps of optioned the life of that great monarch, and certainly convenied the army and the carifal on the accession of his successor. But the nation were strangers to that 1 tical in securent; the private sol hers who encazed in it were entirely by that alike of political rights, or the forms by which they are to be exercise 1113, and the authority of the Czar is still obeyed with un furious of criental sersolute in mane nort of his east dominions national elevation and individual enjoyment, which constitute the principal elements in the lust of conquest.

The institutions and government of Russia are calculated in an pends on military cm. extraordinary manner to foster in all ranks this ambitious spirit, playment, or and turn it in a permanent manner to the purposes of national elevation. Though property is hereditary in its descent, and titles follow the same destination, rank is personal only, and depends entirely upon military grade or the emperor's employment. Thus, a general of the emperor's creation takes precedence of a prince or count by birth; and the highest noble, if he has not a commission in the army, finds himself without either a place or consideration in society. This curious combination of the European principle of the hereditary descent of honours, with the Asiatic maxim that all rank is personal only, and flows from the gift or office under the sovereign, leads, however, to hardly any of the embarrassments in practice which might, a priori, be expected; for as the necessity of military office for personal rank is every where known, and, from the warlike turn of the people, cordially acquieseed in, it is universally sought after, and no one thinks of aspiring to any place in society who is not either actually, or by the emperor's gift, in the imperial army. The necessity of this real or fictitious military rank creates a multiplication of military honours and designations, which is not a little perplexing to foreigners, and sometimes excites a smile even in the Russians themselves (1); but it is admirably calenlated to foster a warlike spirit in the people, and, by keeping alive the feeling that distinction is to be won only by military honours, to coin for the nation the reality of military success (2).

Military spi- In consequence of this universality of the military spirit, and allprevailing sway of military ambition, the whole energies of the nation are, to an extent which appears almost incredible to one of the democratic states of Western Europe, absorbed in the profession of arms. From the emperor's son to the peasant's child, the career of ambition lies in the same channel; the same objects of desire inflame and animate the heart. In the first years of infancy, the mind of the young Casarowitch is warmed by the recital of the exploits of his father's warriors; the long series of Russian victories is ever present to his mind; his earliest feeling of exultation, his proudest day in life, is when he is first arrayed in the mimic garb of the invincible grenadiers, who have carried the Museovite standards in triumph to Paris, Erivan, and Adrianople (5). He grows up under the influence of the imperial palace at St Petersburg, on each side of the door, were placed two of the finest grenadiers of the regiment, incasuring at least six feet two or three inches. When we had passed these in the unter-hall, to our amazement we beheld the two little grand-dukes standing as sentinels, and dressed with minute exactness as privates of the regiment, with their knapsacks, greateouts, and haversacks, all in marching order. To the inexpressible amusement of every body, the emperor lunself then put the little princes through the manual and platoon exercises, which they both did incomparably. The universal delight, from the oldest general to the lowest subaltern of the gnards, was something I cannot describe."-Londondenan's Tour to Russia, i. 248. The author has the satisfaction of giving an entire confirmation to this statement, if any were wanting, from the evidence of his highly respected friend, General Tcheffkine, aide de camp to the Emperor Nicholas, and chief of the joining engineers of Russia, who has frequently seen the little gracil-dukes ou mimic duty on these interesting occasions.

^{(1) &}quot;There is another distinction in Russia, tho frequency of which puzzled us not a little—that of General. We had heard several people, distinguished neither by warlike looks nur dress, spoken of as generals; some of whom were treated by the young officers with very little deference. One proved to be the director of a theatre, who held the office by gift of the emperor, as many ilo who have never heen in the army it is lavished in a way which makes it perfectly worthless. We heard of an apothécary who is a general, and the empress's accoucheur may be lieutenaot-colonel. A penniless lieutenant, with his epaulettes on his shoulders, will get horses instantly in travelling, when a merchaot, who has thousands must writ for hoose so universal is the thousands, must wait for hoors, so universal is the respect paid to military rank."—Breuner's Russia, i. 210, 211. These are trifles; but they are straws which show how the wind sets; and Europe will find it a pretty stiff north-east wind which has set in from the plains of Muscovy.

⁽²⁾ Breomer's Russia, i. 210, 212.
(3) "In the interior of the salle blanche of the same feelings; the troops salute him, per with the title of emperat, be to the there" and his familiar and uniform appellation to them is, not got sore, but "children (1)" The empire, in the or group of the " recorde resert, is a vast family, of which the Czar is the head, the chief interest of all its memor their children, when required, to the imperial will (2)

bers is to enlarge the possessions and exten I the glary of the dan edit entere. and their first duty, to ober the imperial commands, and same or it emplies When such is the tone of mind which persales the ratice ar like peasantry, it may be readily believed, that the statit of all the inmode product je increase, and, in effect, of the whole empire, is even to big military, and that their energies are almost exclusively despie f to war in pursults. In truth, this object entirely occupies their thoughts, and errer thang else is comparatively neglected. Commerce, if ough fracts' leg . 7. is held in little estimation, and is for the most part enground by the mere! and of the English factory. Agriculture, though not less than in the American states the main source of the national strength, is left to the facts, we street secute it as their fathers did before there; and, in communerer, make I we advance in any roved methods of cultivation, Ju postlor of er evel emplie. ments, save diplomacy, are lield in niter contempt (1 ; t'e while a minet the empire who aspire to any station in secrets, are level fe the array the hundred and eights thousand young men, the forest of the empire, seeprising ten thousand of cere, among whom are found almost all i stabut and energy, are constantly at the guillic semination (5 , where n tire et a & tion is taught in the very best ruprer, and the while know die e mmins cated is of a kind to be available in warlise pursues I nonge broom hereif to consider well how if e pressure of sixty millions of man, diet gerry half century, directed by the whele trient of the mate ne esta ate f at erefe semparies, is to be avertel; and if one who let ere t'at a ra " rea fo aris ng-that commercial interests are to rule the wirth, an fame great left are of democracy to overal elm all other lestite's en, won't i's well the o'em

plate the spirit and institutions of this state, which now possesses an eighth part of the whole surface of the globe (1).

Universality As a natural consequence of this warlike spirit, and of the military or decorations to all institutions in the empire, military honours, badges, and other insignia, are universal, and distributed, both to civil and military entand signia, are universal, and distributed, both to civil and military emblary emblants, with a profusion which, to an Englishman, appears injudicious, and materially lessens their real value as a badge of merit. In the midst of these numerous decorations, however, there is one which none can wear but those who really earned it, which cannot by its nature be prostituted to unworthy objects, and of which the emperor is more proud than of the English order of the Garter-the medal given to all the soldiers who had served in the campaign of 1812. With this exception, however, and notwithstanding the numerous attempts to create distinctions by classes in the orders, they appear, at least to an English eye, exceedingly common; and Talleyrand expressed this feeling with his usual felicity, when, on seeing, at a Russian party, the English ambassador enter the room in a plain blue coat, amidst the galaxy of stars with which he was surrounded, he exclaimed-"Ma foi! il est bien distingué (2)!"

Militai y force of Russia. The military strength of the empire is proportioned to its vast physical resources, and the strong warlike disposition which distinguishes its inhabitants. It consists at present, (1840,) according to the information of Marshal Marmont and the Marquess of Londonderry, who had access to the best sources of information, of six corps, or separate armies of the line, comprising seventy-two regiments of infantry, twenty-four of light eavalry, ninety batteries of foot, and twelve of horse artillery. Each regiment of infantry consists of seven battalions of a thousand men each; of which six are always on active service, and the seventh at the depot in the interior; so that the infantry of the line musters, at least on paper, above five hundred thousand men. In addition to this, there are twelve regiments of infantry and twelve of cavalry, twelve batteries of foot, and four of horse artillery, in the Guards; twelve regiments of grenádiers on foot, four on horseback, and seventeen grenadier batteries. There are also twenty-four regiments of heavy reserve cavalry, and twelve batteries of reserve horse artillery; and the corps of the Caucasus, of Orenburg, of Siberia, Finland, and the interior, which number among them no less than a hundred battalions of a thousand men each, forty regiments of horse, and thirty-six batteries of artillery. In addition to these forces, the emperor has at his disposal one hundred and fortysix regiments of Cossacks, each eight hundred strong, and of which fifty-six come from the steppes of the Don, and are superior to any troops in the world for the service of light cavalry. If these immense bodies of men were complete, they would number above 850,000 infantry, and 250,000 horse. But the ranks are far from being complete: innumerable officers in every grade have an interest in representing the effective force as greater than it really is, as they draw pay and rations for the whole, and appropriate the allowances of the men of straw to themselves; and in no service in the world is the difference so considerable between the muster-rolls of an army on paper, and the real number of sabres and bayonets it can bring into the field. Still, after making every allowance for these well-known deficiencies, it is not going too far to assert, that Russia, without weakening her establishments in the fortresses and the interior, can produce 400,000 infantry, 100,000

⁽¹⁾ Krusenstern's Instruction Publique en Russie, Warsaw, 1837. Loud. ii. 156, 159. Marmont, Yoyages.

⁽²⁾ Slade, Russia in 1838, 174.

llm . a il a sea : a t ma as fo

West LXVIII.

borse, and 50,600 artillery rien, for essentiar operations begond befrontier, though it would require more than one year to lairg even the laif of this finmense force to bear on any point in Latere or ten (1) from of The total revenues of the empare at the moment of not exern!

the total resentes of the employer's and are element from a rent of the lands which they cultivates the engine ocer dut or, the trains the sale of heritable a roperty, which is gated at five per cent the of trees from the obrok, or personal date paid by the persont of the erown, at 115 .

spirits: the salt tropopole; and the produce of it e inper all times it may appear surprising flow forces to improve can be maintained by revenues as inconsiderable; but the marvel croses when it e extremely or all anmouth to suffice for the par of the troops are taken free core free in his fine a's celebrated sant z, "that excesser a permy thed sen in the list ter to e t because expr are mint, but because proce are fee," was proces proceeding of exemple ed. The cost of a f of sol her for a sear in lived a is i tile meer t' in a third of what it is in France, and a fith of his continuous friting, is t'e earning and actillers, the difference is still more stratum; # Timp on mal not of the soldier-perity a rolle for all at hit a deserte perition of the able: I ut so much of it is support ell I s cature an Lett er del per sea, a me of which so to entich his offeres, it at I chas southelf a faction per um to apend on his own comfute-a putace, enalter itie, with it related the of what is enjoyed in the was serve. The Courts receive to it is elected pay aronally, out of which they are et at ta farout themselves to b stateled needelalls, Assome enmeetation, towere, fettele telam of off in tar, except ligning of fee leenmen free and troing the same, and the he enteled to be if we size ofter twents veres were, e. en mi ab treet ale prepartius et fire bur breient' a Lif nel ti tas el a fem an malta eroun domains, which yield a large part of the aut checme, and terrer !

and capitation tax, to which able every total bul in the empire, whether serf or free, is sal ferted; a tax on the carried of merchants, the period of life, proves a blessing at another: the labourers on an estate constitute, as they formerly did in the West Indies, the chief part of its value; and thus the proprietor is induced to take care of his slaves by the same motives which prompt him to do so with his huildings or cattle. Relief in siekness, care of orphans, maintenance of the maimed, or in old age, are important advantages to the labouring classes even in the most favourable circumstances; and with all the facilities for rendering themselves independent, which the habits of civilized life, and the power of accumulating and preserving capital arising from the interchange of commerce, afford; in rude periods, when these advantages are unknown, and the means of providing during the vigour for the weakness of life do not exist, they are of inestimable value. The long want of such maintenance and care for the poor, is the true secret of the misery of Ireland; it would be a real blessing to its inhabitants, in lieu of the destitution of freedom, to abtain the protection of slavery (4). Stripes, insults, and compulsory labour are no light evils; but they are as nothing compared to the wasting agonies of famine, the violence of illdirected and ungovernable passions, which never fail to seize upon prematurely emancipated man. The servitude and forced industry of the serf fill up the interval, the long and important interval, between the roving independence of the savage, who lives by the chase or the milk of his herds, and the voluntary toil of the freeman, around whom artificial wants have thrown the unseen but riveting chains of civilized life. But for its existence, this wide chasm could never have been passed; for man will never labour voluntarily till he has acquired the habits and desires of an advanced stage in society; and those habits, when generally pervading the community, can exist only from the effect of previous centuries of compulsory labour (2).

The army is kept up by a compulsory levy of so many per hundred or thousand, levied by government under the authority of an imperial ulase. In general, five in a thousand is the annual quota which is required; but on pressing occasions, two or three per hundred are demanded; and on occasion of the French advance to Moscow, ten in that number were voluntarily voted by the Russian nobles. Each proprietor is obliged, in addition to the man, to furnish his ontlit to government, amounting to thirty-three rubles (L.1. 5s. 10d.) The day of drawing the men on the several estates is one of universal mourning and lamentation; the conscript leaves his paternal home, with scarce a hope of ever seeing it again; his mother and sisters make the air resonnd with their shricks; chains are often necessary to secure his appearance at the appointed place of muster; and his companions in tears accompany him for miles on the road to his destination. In this, however, as in other cases, where a separation from old habits is induced by irresistible necessity, the human mind hends to the force of circumstances: with his military dress and the first use of arms, the young soldier puts off the recollection of former days; a new career of ambition, fresh repaid for their labour at the government prices, a sum adequate to the purchase of a pound and a half of meat and three of bread daily, in addition to the produce of the land allotted to the conviets.—Couname's Tracels in Russia and Siberia, i. 79 and 190. It would be a happy day for the Irish peasantry, the slaves of their own heedless and savage passions, when they exchanged places with the Siberian convicts, subjected to the less grievous yoke of punishment and despotism.

ment and despotism.
(2) Clarke's Travels, i. 90 and 170. Cox's Travels, iii. 183, Heber in Clarke, i. 170. Tooke's Russia

b. iv. c. 1.

^{(1) &}quot;I have no hesitation in saying, that the condition of the peasantry in Russia is far superior to the same class in Ireland. Provisions are plentiful, good, and cheap; good comfortable log-houses are to be seen in every village; immense droves of eattle are scattered over unlimited pastures; and whole forests of fuel may be had for a trible. With ordinary care and economy the Russian peasant may become rich, especially in those villages situated between the two capitals. In Siheria, scarcely any full-grown man is to be found among the convicts who has not two or three horses, and as many eattle; and they yield him, from the price

... in extent: a surface nearly two-thirds of that of the whole , and incomparably more level and fertile. Some part of it is the Ukraine, and it is all destitute of hills; but a considerable 3th covered with a velvet carpet of turf, is probably destined to er, from the want of rivers or brooks, inhabited only by noin. Unlike the peasants of the greater part of Russia, the people are entirely relieved from the fetters of servitude. "Free as a common proverb through all the south of the Muscovite duir political privileges, even in the midst of the Russian empire, those of democratic equality; and the active roving habits of the ingly exemplified even in those situations where they are fixed in in, and permanently engaged in the labours of agriculture. Though fry there is very conspicuous, the villages clean and thriving, the te and comfortable, and the produce of their fisheries on the Don terable (1); yet the dispositions of the people are still those of their prefathers. Horses comprise their chief, often their only luxury; races or games their great delight; five hundred or a thousand institute the study of the great, three or four are possessed by the andless pastures furnish to all the means of ample subsistence; and ce ready, at the call of their beloved betman, to follow his fortunes les of Enropean plunder or glory (2).

Under a pure and cloudless heaven are spread out the houndless steppes of the Ukraine, of which it was long ago said that "the sky is ever screne, and storms and hurricanes are unknown." One who has been accustomed to the gloomy forest, dark clouds, sterile I marshes, of the north of Russia, can hardly figure to himself the s fields waving with corn, the valleys strewed with the fresh down ing vegetation, the meadows whose luxuriant covering conceals from he waters of the streams. Still less can the habitations of the people in ssia convey an idea of the cottages in the Ukraine, built of carved trees with white washed clay, with smooth polished earthen floors. The dirty of Great Russia, with his long tangled hair, bespeaks the Tartar rule; villager of the north, with his clear blue eyes and light brown hair, te Selavonian blood. But in the Ukraine, the serious reflecting connof the man, his tall figure, half-shaven head, long mustaches and speech, discover the mingled descent of the ancient Russian and siatic. His dress bears marks of the Lithuanian and Polish rule of ituries. He is slow, taciturn, and of few words; but shrewd, inteland rigorous in the observance of promises, both given and received. he one lives entirely in the present, the other dwells chiefly on the emind the Cossack of his former glories, his recent historical achieveand you have found the passport to his heart: his countenance will n, his eye kindle, you will hear the song of the steppe, and be asd at the cheerfulness of his disposition (5).

The origin of this singular people accounts in a considerable degree for their peculiar character. Nature and man have stamped an impress upon their minds, which can never be effaced. Placed on the frontiers of Europe and Asia, they have always dwelt in the plains which, from the earliest ages, have been the highway by export of fish and caviare from the f the Don Cossacks is no less than 500,000 c about L.25,000 annually : a sum equivalent to at least L.100,000 a year in this country .-Marte-Brun, vi. 402.

(2) Malte-Brun, vi. 402. Bremner, ii. 428, 446.
(3) Polenoy, Hist. of Russia, ii. 317.

at unfrequently the seen the nativity of a more elevated state of existence. In one instance outs, the natural feelings of grief at the separation of the young conscript from all that are dear to him, were overcome by a still holier feeling. When the regiments were and the great levy which followed the French advance to part of their relatives, not of sorrow; and the bing in a grief was felt, were those whose sons were not called on to join their corp rades in the sacred duty of defending their country (1).

Vast as are the unlitary resources which this system of regular conscription, in a country so immense, and containing a population so rapidly Increasing, places at the disposal of the Bussian emperor, they form by no means the whole of those on which he has to rely. Whole nations of soldiers are contained in the Muscovite dominions, and are ever ready to start into activity at a signal from the Czar. The wiltrany colonies consti-.... and the increasing part of the imperial possessions, the warlike strength of the empire. They r Alexander, who, being struck with the advantages which similar establishments on the frontiers of Transylvania (2) had long afforded to the Austrians in warding off the incursions of the Musculman lorse, resolved in 1817 to establish them on a great scale in the rent parts of his dominions; and the same system was extended and enlarged under the guidance of the able general De Witt, in the southern provinces, in 1821. Several divisions of cavalry were colonized in this manner; and a Posting population of seventy thousand wandering tribes located on the districts allotted to there, to furnish recruits to the troops. The holders of these lawls, which they receive from the crown, are bound, as the only payn ent il ex make for them, to lodge and maintain a soldier; and to labour for forty-fort days in the year for the public works in pregress in the country. If excare salready in the military colonies twelve thousand men, constantly really and equipped, as a depot for the twenty regiments which are distributed in it s manner, and the warlike spirit of the youth from whom the rectify are fornished, is perpetually keptalize by the recital of glories, pends, and plans der, which they hear from the veicrans who are settled on the lands, 'Il . military spirit thus comes to animate the entire population; if expet da corrals fell rolly regiments alone, but the all te flourishing even by when they are surrout ded. As the experiment has not with rather sucres, and there is no limit to the extent of waste land which may be appropriated In the Measure dominions to these purposes, it is the cultipasses and by our to the at bit in which may thus be readed the power of the branging a sertern which superal 's to the printers to ure of the feedal ares the regular organization and powerful control of ma fern gavernment 31

The Constray are another pare of enignment wares as, who all had girer lan is bie fitary tenare, ar bare able, wien mere ate THE quires, to farmit the whole mate pop to am capit to af foor is arms for the service of the state. The line a handle to martin et a ternt og elfemmene extrat pitt speer famor paleut til ta of fillt speer gran out ling to a self Bount in 488. Washing himse the dad myn I ? and times t mus 2 Martine Symptom, by $3 m $3 d graphical miles in extent: a surface nearly two-thirds of that of the whole British islands, and incomparably more level and fertile. Some part of it is as fruitful as the Ukraine, and it is all destitute of hills; but a considerable portion, though covered with a velvet carpet of turf, is probably destined to remain for ever, from the want of rivers or brooks, inhabited only by nomad herdsmen. Unlike the peasants of the greater part of Russia, the people of this district are entirely relieved from the fetters of servitude. "Free as a Cossaek," is a common proverb through all the south of the Muscovite dominions; their political privileges, even in the midst of the Russian empire, approach to those of democratic equality; and the active roving habits of the race are strongly exemplified even in those situations where they are fixed in one situation, and permanently engaged in the labours of agriculture. Though their industry there is very conspicuous, the villages elean and thriving, the houses white and comfortable, and the produce of their fisheries on the Don very considerable (1); yet the dispositions of the people are still those of their Scythian forefathers. Horses comprise their chief, often their only luxury; equestrian races or games their great delight; five hundred or a thousand stallions constitute the studs of the great, three or four are possessed by the poor; boundless pastures furnish to all the means of ample subsistence; and all are alike ready, at the call of their beloved hetman, to follow his fortunes to the scenes of European plunder or glory (2).

Under a pure and cloudless heaven are spread out the boundless steppes of the Ukraine, of which it was long ago said that "the character of sky is ever serene, and storms and hurricanes are unknown." One its inhabiwho has been accustomed to the gloomy forest, dark clouds, sterile lands, and marshes, of the north of Russia, ean hardly figure to himself the boundless fields waving with corn, the valleys strewed with the fresh down of blooming vegetation, the meadows whose luxuriant covering conceals from the eye the waters of the streams. Still less can the habitations of the people in Great Russia convey an idea of the cottages in the Ukraine, built of carved trees covered with white washed clay, with smooth polished earthen floors. The dirty peasant of Great Russia, with his long tangled hair, bespeaks the Tartar rule; while the villager of the north, with his clear blue eyes and light brown hair. attests the Sclavonian blood. But in the Ukraine, the serious reflecting countenance of the man, his tall figure, half-shaven head, long mustaches and abrupt speech, discover the mingled descent of the ancient Russian and savage Asiatic. His dress bears marks of the Lithuanian and Polish rule of four centuries. He is slow, taciturn, and of few words; but shrewd, intelligent, and rigorous in the observance of promises, both given and received. While the one lives entirely in the present, the other dwells chiefly on the past. Remind the Cossack of his former glories, his recent historical achievements, and you have found the passport to his heart: his countenance will brighten, his eye kindle, you will hear the song of the steppe, and be astonished at the cheerfulness of his disposition (5).

Incredible devastation of the Tartar tribes in Southern Russia in former times.

The origin of this singular people accounts in a considerable degree for their peculiar character. Nature and man have stamped an impress upon their minds, which can never be effaced. Placed on the frontiers of Europe and Asia, they have always dwelt in the plains which, from the earliest ages, have been the highway by

(2) Malte-Brun, vi. 402. Bromner, ii. 428, 446. (3) Polenoy, Hist. of Russia, ii. 317.

⁽¹⁾ The export of fish and caviare from the country of the Hon Cossacks is no less than 500,000 rubles, or about L.25,000 annually: a sum equivalent to at least L.100,000 a year in this country.—

which Seythian violence passed on to civilized plunder. Amidst tombs which, rising on either hand amidst the boundless wastes, marked the bloodstained passage of the multitudinous nations whose names, as Chateaubriand has said, " are known only to God;" amidst walls raised by upknown hands, and cemeteries whatening with the bones of Russians, Hungarians, Lithuanians, and Poles, the Tartar still discerned the tracks which led from his far distant steppes to the seat of civilized man. Thights of rapacious Linds announced their approach, and the moornful omen was confirmed by the glowing sty that reddened as their torches consumed the villages. The harbarran hordes, in their sudden attacks, overpowered the inhabitants, and serred the fruits of their toil before the narlike proprietors could assemble from their castles for their defence. Prompt in aggresion, prompter still in fight, they draged into captivity the youth of both sexes, driving off the herds, and leaving behind them only the silence of ashes and the corpses of the slain. Notwithstanding this coaseless havoe, the population still sprang up afresh upon that beautiful soil; out up, as it was, says a Sclavenian poet," by the tramp of horse, fertilized by human blood, and white with bones-where serrow grew abundantly (f), the face It was amidd the timery and from the effects of this constant devastation, which continued for several centuries, that the foreach nation took its tree. Two corners of land, preshooted in it a great streams of conquest to the south-west, remalued as I laces of refuge f e the furthers-one beyond the Ban, towards the Sea of Atoll, and the other berond the plands of the Drieper, towards the lack & a-and there were the cradle of this singular people, as the lagung of the l'o were, from a olunlar cause and at the same period, of the Veretian Lepublic. About party milles lefon hiow, the Duleper forms a sariety of islands, upmanisof seventy in number. The lanks of the river, here fringed with wood, there strep or marely-the deep careens in the rocky relands, expected by operating trees or tanzled thorn I ushes, effered a ferourable place of relaze, when the over country was overroin by the barbarrans. At the epoch of the first general invasion of the Tartars, and again during the Lithnanian wars, many persons found shelter here, and their untaker was subsequently increased by the arrival ela lienturera, anidol la necessita er the lore al ellat ter la docaters from the Lithuanian, Polich, Hougarian, and Walichian ganta; by logithey from Tartar landage; or by settlewating from the opperation of their lords. The molley eren was at frei ell tracter, and presented from uncersieggin gliebmite, fy aguleer f remz, during the comme meafimity, er' berg. Le ne, at Il and tale ur, fica fin'lg, authe danger rol e laway, tiere tentries were f up tien, a lift of set introdupon weret excursions lather rights livering plante, which, by degrees, exter ledition the laterer as labors the al tracificities we full every ma" noticenstantions to la more pererite times, it so igreat over it nation court tome, fort part forts on the steppen a leading of the comb, at them, in lando traffing they interested is mind the de of the rate ring medit on word. I not an extension it in a same ter fe ja nirt auf mal gibert ein nathent berem rein allere eitebent Cit . mit of a a all or for operation and and a rea . son a firm of mercial relative tiens la transfatance estate antique menas anget attore iben ware nur if tan Meratan, tentinises at. at " be built at the continter care and a test of a total at the are " do or efferente · letti-franchiare and at there, the unit be a se a week we shall plant new hedges, fill up our ditches with earth, cover our thorns with recds—soon others shall arise. Sooner shall the foe be wearied with destruction than we with restoration." Independence, amidst a world of serfs, gave charms to this precarious existence; freedoms sweetened the toils and lightened the dangers of these unfettered rovers. Their own industry, the spoils of others, brought them plenty: mounted on swift chargers, free as the wind of the steppes, they enjoyed their liberty; and generations grew up amidst the clashing of swords and the song of battle. Singing the airs of his native wilds, the Cossack of former days left his home on a cruise to Azoff, Sinope, or Constantinople; a beautiful captive often became his wife, the richest stuffs his attire, his enemies' best weapons his arms, He returned home with his trophies, distributed his spoils, and took no charge of the morrow; but the trophies of his prowess were religiously preserved; his children played with his sword, or arrayed themselves in the panoply of his enemies. These habits still continue, though the objects and scene of his warfare are changed; and the Cossack youth point to the cuirasses of the French horsemen, or the standards of the Imperial Guard, preserved in their churches; and honour these prizes of recent valour, as their ancestors did the trophies of Trebizond or the spoils of Constantinople (1).

[·] Languagi, tauras an effand a crysta to th

1812.]

Nearly the whole Cossacks of the Don capable of bearing arms, atthe victories tended the standard of Platoff to the neighbourhood of Moscow, and France on the Cossacks. buted to the astonishing results of the campaign; and nothing now arrests so certainly the volatile youth of the plains of the Don as the recital, by the old warriors, of their exploits on the fields of Germany and France, the marvels of Paris, the wines and the women of the south. The shining armour of the cuirassiers of the Imperial Guard, the trophies of the hard-fought field of Eylau (2); the eagles and standards which were won amidst the eannonade of Leipsic, hang, the objects of universal veneration, in the church of Tcherkask, the principal town of their country; and though their institutions are so free as almost to rival the ruinous democracy of Poland, the turbulence of pastoral republicanism is gradually yielding to the seductions and the address of the Imperial court, and on all important occasions it is effectually drowned in the indelible passion for warfare and plunder (5).

'Above a hundred thousand Cossacks, distributed in one hundred and sixty-four regiments, are now to be found in the Muscovite of fighting, armies; their physical force, and the vast influence which they exerted in the later years of the war, render them an object of serious importance and interest to all the European states. The word "Cossack" means a volunteer or free partizan (4); their whole service is voluntary; one of their most highly valued privileges is, that they cannot be chained, when enrolled and on the march to the military stations, as the other conscripts of Russia are, when they prove refractory. They hold their lands by military tenure; and, in consequence of it, every individual is obliged to serve four years in the Russian armies, and this they do in time of peace for a mere nominal pay. This service is to them rather an amusement and delight than a duty. Trained from early childhood to the use of the lance and sword; familiarized to the management of the small but active horse, which can undergo almost any fatigue, and seldom falls even in the roughest country, the young Cossack joyfully mounts the playfellow and companion of his infancy, and

⁽¹⁾ Gnorowski, Poland, i. 74, 75.

⁽²⁾ Ante, vi. 37.

⁽³⁾ Malie-Brun, vi. 402, 408. Bremner, ii. 425, 436. Clarke's Travels, i. 283, 296.

⁽⁴⁾ Karamsin, vi. 476.

wends his way, exulting, to the unknown but off imagined scenes of distant plunder. At home he is kind, gentle, and domestic in his habits, but when called to foreign warfare, he assumes at once the feroceous habits of his Seythian ancestors. Pilage is their principal object, and the whole produce of their marauding which will admit of being carried, is stowed away between duced a plentiful harvest of captives (1).

Triting to the first state horsemen, to whom they belong by desent, if of the first state horse batter, and the Cossacks do not attack in a close body like the sea testing and the first state. Furropean cavallers, but in a sucars, or foose charge, where each man selects his individual antagonist; and, with a loud honrra, they hear furrously down upon their opponents. In the course of the war in Germany, regular cavalry. But it is chiefly in the service of light troops that the Cossacks are seen to advantage, and then their services are invaluable. Never had an army such eyes as they furnish; none ever possessed a host capable of drawing such a screen before the observation of the enemy. Mounted on their hardy little hoeses, they have frequently been known to murch a hundred miles in twenty-four houes, loaded with arms and plunder; and in their heaviest marching order, they plunge into rivers, thread morasses, explore thickets, and cross the most fearful deserts, whether parched by the heats of summer or charged with the snows of winter. As army with the Cossacks in its front need fear a surprise, none with them heading the pursust can be secure against it. Their velocity, activity, and courage, render them peculiarly dangerous to a retreating, often fatal to a flying enemy. When the rearguard halts, and a respectable force collects to oppose their incursions, they never hazard an attack, but fly without hesitation, like the Parthans of old, till a more favourable opportunity of renewing the pursuit occurs; and when the enemy again retires, they press upon his retreating columns, mundate the country on all sides of his line of march, and are frequently to be seen a hundred toiles in advance of the pursuing force (2)

, " f eye of P a statch for from being inconsulerable. . ' - in to Great Brlof Bussle to the states, nor for trin, is t which durable danger to other states is probably to be apprehended. At present, the I uperor Archolas has thirty ships of the line and twenty-two strong frigates at Cronstadt, besides sixteen of the line and twelve frigates in the Black Sea. It has been maintained nearly at that level for the last thirty years, and what renders it peculiarly formulable to l'ingland is, that this large force is not distracted by the defence of any colonies or distant possessions, that it is kept constantly on the war establishment, and with stores and provisions on board ready for immediate operations; that the Battle fleet in summer mana uvres for some months with thirty thousand men on board, that, though extremely deficient in nautical skill, the Bussley sailors are admirably trained to the practice of guinery, and stand with devoted rese-

⁽¹⁾ Personal Observation Scotts Nepalion, v. 362 he P. Williams Campiel 132", 27-21 From 532 Bromore 1-13" 419
(2) Personal Observation Scotts Separate V

lution to their pieces alike in naval as military war (1); and that, under protection of the bastions of Cronstadt, and the eastles of the Dardauelles, they possess alike in the north and the south, impregnable places of refuge (2).

General dis. Still, though the danger to England is doubtless great while such inclination a force lies within a fortnight's sail of London, with hardly any to the Navy. fleet at the disposal of the British government to protect the English shores (5), it is evident that it is not from the naval power of Russia that the liberties of Europe are permanently to be endangered. The spirit of the nation is essentially military: territorial conquest, not commercial extension or distant colonization, is her destined path: the despotie nature of the government, the closing of the Baltic by ice during half the year, and of the Enxine by the gates of the Dardanelles during the whole, are alike inconsistent with naval greatness. If England were animated with her ancient national spirit, and her government were of sufficient strength to direct a part of her vast maritime resources into the public service, she might behold with contempt the plaything of the Czar performing its mimic evolutions on the Baltic, In the words of Demosthenes to the Athenian people, to whose situation in regard to Philip, that of Britain to Russia in these times bears a striking, even a fearful resemblance-"It is your weakness which is his strength; and he owes his present increase of power infinitely more to your indolence than to his own exertions (4)."

There is one remarkable peculiarity of the Russian empire, which, coal in the to the people of the British isles, is a subject of particular interest Empire. and importance. Rich as her territories are in agricultural proand its im. ductions, there is one mineral, without which she can never attain to manufacturing greatness, which is almost altogether wanting. Coal is scarcely to be found to the west of the Ural mountains; at least, where it is discovered, it exists in such inconsiderable strata as to be not worth working. The lid of the box in which this valuable mineral is found in the British islands is there; the bottom of red sandstone is there also; but the intermediate seams of coal and ironstone are very rarely found (5). The latter occurs indeed in some places; and at Toula, extensive fromworks exist for the internal supply of the empire; but without coal she can never compete, in the supply of great manufactories with those of countries where fuel is supplied from the spontaneous bounty of nature in the mineral regions of the earth. Thus the destinies of England and Russia are as clearly traced out by the hand of nature, in the physical peculiarities of the two countries, as they are in the moral character and disposition of their respective inhabitants.

They are obviously intended for greatness in different lines; they are calculated to grow with each other's growth, and strengthen with their strength. The world is large enough for both; and each will discharge its duty, and perform its mission best, by avoiding interference with the path of the other. Destitute of coal, and scantily supplied with ironstone—with its principal harbours blocked up half the year by ice, and the greater part of its population far removed from the ocean in the midst of vast agricultural or pastoral plains—the people of Russia are as manifestly disqualified from attaining

^{(1) &}quot;Lay yourself alongside a Frenchman; but outmanœuvre a Russian."—Nelson.

⁽²⁾ Brem. i. 375, 376.

^{(3) &}quot;It is a mistake to say that Great Britain is utterly unprotected. She has three ships of the line, and three guard-ships affoat, to protect the shores of England."—Speech of Sin Charles Anas, Lord of the Admirally, House of Commons, March 8, 1839. Parl. Debates, in they are calculated by their varies obscheme to their cluef, to attain with ironstone—entitions, and the German and the Atlantic ocean, placed midway between European civilization and American increase —Great Parlain is as clearly marked out by intuition to be the markshop of the world, as she is evidently fitted, by the industrious habits, active character, and independent sprit of the rubabilitants, to perform the great work of markshop.

⁽⁴⁾ Demost. Phil. 2d. Bremner's Russia, i. 375, 376.

⁽⁵⁾ This important fact I had from my highly valued friend Mr. Murchison, President of the Geological Society of London, whose recent travels in Russia have cliented so much valuable information in regard to the mineral riches of that empire.

riting colonization diroughout the globe, restly of Justice is venal throughout the whole Muscovite, as all oriental throughout the whole Muscovite, as all oriental through dominions. The judges are numerous, and abundant means of the Rear appeal, ostensibly calculated to check injustice, are provided; but the conclusions appeal is every where wanting—a conscientions spirit, strict the respect for their functions. This net and transfer according to the state of t a withstand

the passions of the group of the lines of the diplomacy of the calunct of St. James's or the lines of the lin ambitious spirit us from d, and the concentration of nearly the whole of its civil mix principal bulwars of the second field to feel the want or popularity, while the nobles, ware of the absolute necessity of abshites to secure these advantages, the second of ment, even from the hundlest ranks, to situations of the second of ment, even from the hundlest ranks, to situations of the second of ment, even from the hundlest ranks, to situations of the second of the se

It is the comparatively unrestricted power of doing this, which constitutes one great source of the strength of absolute monarchies: it is the necessity of sacrificing talent to influence, in ordinary times, in almost every department of the state, which is the chief cause of the acknowledged inferiority of the public servants, whether civil or military, in constitutional monarchies. But, for the same reason, the rulers of a free government, when public danger or the necessities of the times have compelled them to overlook the ordinary sources of influence, and seek for talent wherever it is to be found, have an incomparably wider field to search, and, in general, will in the end bring a greater and more wide-spread mass of talent to sustain the national fortunes. In the first case, the foresight and energy of government supply the want of vigour and animation in the inferior ranks of society; in the latter, the ability and information of the middle and lower classes, compensate, in the end, the weakness and vacillation of government. In the first instance, the government forces greatness upon the people; in the latter, the people force greatness upon the government. Hence the despotie state will be generally successful if a contest occurs in the outset; but the democratic community, if it withstands the shock, is more likely to prove victorious in the end: and hence a nation which, like the Roman in ancient, or the British in India in modern times, unites the foresight of patrician direction with the vigour of democratic execution, can hardly fail to obtain the empire of the world.

But while the steady persevering policy of the Imperial cabinet, joined to the remarkable succession of able sovereigns, who, from which prethe time of Peter the Great, have swayed the Russian sceptre, has authorities. hitherto at least drawn forth talent in a surprising manner, both in the civil and military career, from the inferior ranks in the state; yet a latent, but almost incurable source of weakness is to be found in the all but universal corruption which pervades inferior functionaries in every part of the empire. Doubtless there are some exceptions even in humble stations; and in the dignified situations of governors of provinces or fortresses, or high .commands in the army, many of the most upright, patriotic, and honourable men in Europe are to be found. But these are the exceptions, not the rule. Generally speaking, corruption is universal in all but the higher officers of government, and even among them it is far from being unusual. The vast extent of the empire; the helpless condition and ignorance of the great majority of its inhabitants; the habits of abject submission to authority which they have imbibed from their religion, or derived from their eastern origin; the viceregal pomp in which the governors of the principal provinces live; the distance of their governments from the central power; and the boundless authority which they enjoy-all conspire to render abuses easy, detection difficult, and punishment dangerous. The salaries enjoyed by the persons in authority are in general small, and their expenses considerable: it is perfectly understood, what is almost universally practised, that they make up the difference in perquisites, presents, or fees, which soon degenerate into absolute corruption. The denunciation of crime is often followed by the discovery and punishment of the criminal, seldom by restitution or redress to the injured party; the official robber comes in place of the private depredator, and the last state of the injured party is often worse than the first (1).

⁽¹⁾ Slade's Russia in 1833, p. 370, 371. Bremner, i. 314, 350.

Informations as to crimes are often avoided from their only superadding the vexation of a prosecution, to no purpose, to the loss already sustained.

It is seldom that stolen property, though often recovered, reaches the private sufferer. The head of the police at Odessa, on a salary of L.250 a-year makes 1.3,000.—Slade's Germany and Russia in 1836-9, 385-389.—BRENNER, i. 346.

. Trajan or a Seen Reffee-

n

40		III OI	Or L	MGPL.	CHIL TY (III.
Effency of	' .				" "- I post those
P.J. et. and					ne
PJee, and of the Em	check on the	abuses of a peror a ven	noe long four	ed in the re	boron. e	uan at the	tilema, or the armed torrore of	the janissarie	name the	ngious s	way or the	thema, or the armed
		, ,		emaii abuse	themselves, were the aint on abuse	S ID
unwearice	d activity, mor	ral
A secret p	olice is establ	ished throu	gh all p	arts of the	diu ec
they are	to Russia who	it the Lion	's Mouth	was to Ve	tice, and, in a certain degree, sa	apply the war	et of that a	ernetua	check m	on all lint democratic corruption	which the n	nfettered n	ress of fr	e countrie	s occasions The mem-
* fet	c police are k	name to ex	AFL AND	and are	n an especial manner,
	- Tare R		ery one,	and are,	n an especial manner,
					es collect information, are in constant cor-
•	1 14 1 /1			oke o	of justice is to be dealt
	•			1~	on serlear, and whose y arrayes for his scizure, d	egradation fiv	ille v ,			or, if he is of so high rank	ar station as	to render s	acy pan	ishment de	lucum or dangerous to 4	f ~ 0000011	the em	erar hi	meelf sets	out in his britchska,
					* 7, 41,
				•
	ple 14 exment				the second of heing seize			VIII TOURINGE	thy me someth, eprulettes					", ", ", ", ", ", ", ", ", ", ", ", ", " the dress (of a convict, i Alexander,	notwithstand	ling lus nat	ntaj keu	tieness of e	inju i urage no dangers can daunt, hav	e been partici	ilarly reina	rkable fo	or the rigoi	ir, celerity, and impartiality,	with which th	ey exercise	el this a	wfal but n	ecessary attribute of soverright		-			-
Friis am?	an setem	however, the	hough it	may and	does establish an 1m-dangers of		-		1-70-0	functionaries, when carried					or the energy of a the do not be	50.m			I the empire to the 29.3			· i la la th obs
	٠, ١,
			' .'.
	ays be reckur.			• •
	belli may reti			•
	ver to impun				nonarch
	undisturbed				5tPc+
tersburg	દ્રિક ભાગભન્દાનિ	e to contem	plate, w	साधारार क	rolal le condition :	of the empire	if such a	tale of t	hings shou	ld arise, if a modern Sejanus ne	re to wield the	e powers of	the sect	et police, c	mly to denounce the virtuous or induce the confiscation of the wealthy; if the numerous spice throughout the Muscovite dominious were to be employed, as the infamous ct as the pen	of Taritus	lus cons	igned to the	e execution of a.m.
				or full	ulty to reward, and tions of this kind dies.

its annals, if a Caligula may be succeeded by a Nerva, an Antonians may give place to a Commodus; and they are fitted to inspire a deeper thankfulness for those institutions which, in the free states of Western Europe, amidst all their concomitant evils, establish public prosperity on a broader basis, and strength en the forces with which virtue combats the inroads of wickedness.

In this eternal conflict between the principles of good and evil, there is one, and one only, sheet anchor to which Russia has to 'trust, and it constitutes the grand distinction between European and ancient civilization.-Rulligion is all powerful with the bulk of the nation; it forms the true national bond of the empire; the foundation at once of the authority of the throne and the morality of the people. When Alexander, amidst the terrors of the French invasion, issued proclamations, breathing devoit confidence in Almighty protection, and invoking the prayers of the Church to the throne of grace to aid the warriors in the deliverance of their country, he appeared to the astonished French to have gone back to the days of the Crusades, and to atter an incomprehensible jargon of mysticism and superstition. He spoke the language, however, of all others the most calenlated to rouse the national efforts; he touched a chord which vibrated alike in the hearts of the rich and the poor; he inspired that lofty spirit, that sublime patriotism, which, looking for its reward in another world, is superior to all the dangers and temptations of the present. Nor was his policy mistaken, even with reference to worldly success. The lever was well worth the wielding which broke the power of Napoléon; the enthusiasm not to be despised which fired the torches of Moscow.

The Greek, as is well known, is the Established Church of Russia, the Clergy, and to which mineteen - twentieths of the people adhere. Its doctrines coincide in the main with those of the Romish persuasion, and the mass constitutes the chief part of their public worship; but it differs from the Church of Rome in two essential particulars—the marriage of the parish priests, and the spiritual authority of the Pope. The first is enjoined, instead of being prohibited; the second denied, instead of being obeyed. The worship of figures, statues, or graven images of any kind, is nuknown; lint ample amends is made in the innumerable crosses which are on almost every occasion made on the breast, and the devout adoration bestowed on painted or other flat representations of our Saviour, or their favourite saints. Among the dignified clergy are many men of profound learning and enlightened piety; but the great mass of the parochial priests are little, if at all, elevated above. the peasants by whom they are surrounded, whose labours they share, and to whose manners they are generally assimilated. Drinking and other gross vices are very frequent among them; and not a few are to be found among the convicts of Siheria, suffering the just punishment of their crimes. Still the elements of incalculable usefulness are to he found among the Russian clergy. They are all supported by land of their own, which renders them independent, at least so far as subsistence is concerned. The profession of the clergy is in a manner hereditary, the sons of serfs not being permitted by their landlords to enter a profession which would deprive them of their services as labourers; and they are looked up to with unbounded veneration by their flocks. The most pernicious doctrines of the Romish church, purgatory, dispensations, indulgences, as well as predestination, election, and other douhtful Calvinistic tenets, are unknown. In the gradual elevation and cul tivation of this established body of spiritual labourers, the true secret of Russian amelioration is to be found. All the efforts of its government should be directed to this object. Doubtless, in the present age, much that may be turned by unhelicf into rideate, is to be found in their customs; but the experienced observer, versed in the ways of himan wickedness, surrounded by the profligacy of custozed heathenism, and acquainted with the necessity of impressing the mass of men by considerations or acts which strike the rate people; he will hope that an antidote to the templations of the senses in soils Muscoil to power has stood forth an object of alarm to the surcounting nations, has been governed by one ruling principle, which differs widely from that of any people who have lutherto made a great impression on human affairs. It is neither founded on the laughty maxim of the Romans, is spare the submissive and subdue the proud, not the more pointe system of the frightsh, whether in Europe or Asia, to support the weak against the strong. It reiss on a combination of physical strength with diplomatic address, of perseverance in object with versability in means, which was never before exhibited on the theatre of the world. Its leading characteristic bas been explained, perhaps with more candour than prudency, by the eloquent Russian historian Karansan: — "The object and the character of our military policy has in virtually been, to seek to be at peace with every body, and to make conquests authout war, always keeping ourselves on the defen-

history, must be sufficient to show that this character is well founded; and that, formulable as the unitary power of the state is, it has prevailed, in every age, rather from pacific encreachments than narlike subjugation

tis lamone. It has been observed that Russia can hardly fall in the end to ob- tun the victory over all her enemies, for she has two powerful allies always on her side - time and space. Relying with well-founded confidence on the inaccessible nature of the Muscovite territory - secured from attack on the north and cast by the Ices of the Pole and the deserts of Tartary - open to attack from the European powers only on the frontier of Poland, and capable there of wearing out even the greatest armies of the western world, by simply retreating until the invader is enveloped in clouds of Asiatic horse, or finds his winding-sheet in the snows of an arctic winterthe calmet of St -Petersburg has the means, without material dancer to itself, of probling by the weakness and dissensions of its enemies, and, by never provoking war till a favourable opportunity occurs of prosecuting it to advantage, of marching, without ever receding, from one acquisition to another. The lineagus pever originate a confest, but are always ready to carry it on Passion never makes them authorate the period of action; success never relaxes the sinews of preparation. So farmidal le is their weight, when fairly roused to exertion, that the powers with whom they are engaged in war, depairing of making any durable impression on such a colosus, are generally glad, even after victory, to surchase a respite from hostility by a cresion of territory; and, surprising to sav, fineda has yeared greater a frantages from her defeate than oil or a stare frem their stetories. I sen the defeat of I rintland was immediately followed by an important acquisition of territory; and the conferences of Tilsit brought her frontiers to the mouth of the Danube and the head of the Gulf of Bothnia. He must be little read in European annals, who is not aware how steadily this system has been pursued by the Russian cabinet, and how signal has been the success with which it has been attended. Never since the god Terminus first receded with the Roman eagles in the provinces beyond the Euphrates, has so steady and uninterrupted an advance been made by any empire towards universal dominion; and it is hard to say, whether it has prevailed most by the ability of diplomatic address, or the vigour of warlike achievement.

Successive When Peter the Great mounted the throne of Russia in 1689, she conquests of the Russians had no seaport but the half-frozen one of Archangel; and his first bistory. naval effort was the construction of two small vessels, which were floated down the Don to the Sea of Azoff. Secluded in boundless solitudes, the Muscovite territory was hardly known to the European nations, and the Museovite power estimated as nothing by the Enropean eabinets. His successes over the Swedes gave him the first harbour which Russia possessed on the Baltic, but Smolensko was still the frontier town towards Poland; and Moseow, dimly descried through the haze of distance, was imperfectly known by having been twice taken and once burned by the victorious squadrons of the Lithuanians. The battle of Pultowa and treaty of Neustadt first 3oth Aug gave the Russians the province of Livonia, and the site where Gronsfadt and St.-Petersburg now stand; the disasters of the Pruth did not permanently check the progress of the empire; the partition of 1772, Sept 1773 brought its frontier on the side of Poland to the Dwina and the Dnieper; by the treaty of Kainardgi, the Muscovite standards were brought down to the Crimea and the Sea of Azoff; vast acquisitions from 1774 Tartary, larger than the whole German empire, next spread their dominion over the boundless tracts of Central Asia; the ukase of 1785, extended their sway over the Crimea, and the vast plains which stretch between the Euxine and the Caspian, as far as the foot of the Caucasus; the 1781 to 1783 treaty of Jassy advanced their frontier to the Duiester, and brought 1792. the now flourishing harbour of Odessa beneath their rule; the in-1793 famous spoliation of 1795, gave them the command of Lithuania; 1794 the conquests of Suwarrow, in 1794, extended their frontier to the Vistula, and the provinces embracing nearly half of the old kingdom of Poland; even the disasters of Friedland, and the treaty of Tilsit, rounded their eastern frontier, by no inconsiderable province, at the expense of their ally Prussia (1).

duchy of Warsaw, which brought her frontier to within a hundred and eighty me loan both Berlin and Vienna, without the intervention of any defeasible.

the Caucasus, and ions, while that of of Ernan and the stoop peak of Atatat whom defends the stoop of the sto peak of At data waves. d the waters of the Araxes the southern frontier of their Asiatic territories. If the war so imprudently provoked by the Turks, in 1828, has not ostensibly

The state of Russia 11 has done more 11 has given security to, Wareality le the ks aid only by her so advantage of possessing a vast inland take, where is a scalable is a learnanship may be acquired, while access to enemies is excluded, and foreign attack may he defied (1)

Negoties. It is impossible to dens, and fruitless to attempt to disguise, that the point an empire of st

which must for creation attacked even on its subscribe front during three or soul monumerate to render available against us. It offers to themselves with transport towards as a 1

but by seizing it by the turner, ...

Hercules to be found who will attempt such an enterprize! We count and attempt it, and the world knows what success we have had Show me an Emperor of Russia, brave, able, and impetious: in a word, a Crar who is worthy of his situation, and Europe is at his fact. He may begin his operations at the distance only of one hundred leagues from the two capitals of Vienna and Berlin, the sovereigns of which are the only obstacles he has to formidable to apprehend. He gains the one by seduction, subdues the other by force, and he is soon in the midst of the lesser princes of Germany, most of whom are his relations or dependants. A few words on liberation and independence will set Italy on fire. Assuredly, in such a situation, I should arrive at Calais by fixed stages, and be the arbiter of Europe (1)".

pescription ST.-Petersburg, the eapital of this boundless dominion, is not of St. Petersburg. less surprising as a work of art, than the empire of which it is the head, is as the growth of nature. Little more than a century ago, the site of this noble metropolis was a salt marsh, lying between the lake Ladoga and the Baltie Sea, in which the natural sterility of the north was enhanced by unhealthy swamps and a wretched soil. It is now one of the most splendid capitals in the world, containing three hundred thousand inhabitants, and excelling any metropolis in Europe in the grandour of its design and durability of the materials of which its public edifices are composed. The discerning eye of Peter the Great first appreciated the commercial advantages of its situation; and, at an enormous expense of life and treasure, his despotic power overcame the formidable obstacles of nature, and amidst the marshes of Livonia creeted a noble gateway to European civilization. Vessels of heavy burden, indeed, cannot come up to St.-Petersburg; but its ontwork of Cronstadt possesses a spacious harbour, where lifty sail of the line can lie in safety, defended by stupendous and impregnable bulwarks from external assault; while the vast power of the Czars, guided by European skill, but inspired by oriental imagination, has constructed the metropolis of their empire on a scale of solidity and magnificence, to which no parallel is to be found in modern times (2).

More than any other capital in Europe, its public edifices are built in a style which seems to aim at eternal duration: the Russian emperors have ransacked all the parts of their immense dominions to obtain the most costly materials for its construction. The granite which is scattered in huge masses through the marshes of Livonia, the marble which lies buried in the mountains of Taurida, compose the columns which decorate the exterior of these edifices; while the malachite of Siberia, the lapis lazuli of the lake Baikal, and the porphyry of the Ural mountains, confer a matchless lustre on their interior apartments. The level surface on which it stands must ever prevent St.-Petersburg from vying with Rome, Moscow, Naples, Edinburgh, or Constantinople, in the beauty of its situation, or the imposing character of its distant aspect; and the construction of the greater part of the private buildings of brick, is a bar to the metropolis acquiring that historic interest which arises from the sight of the dwellings of many successive generations, standing side by side, like the shadows of the dead to impress the living: but the sublime public edifices, which the magnificence of successive sovereigns has erected in different reigns, will remain eternal monuments of the vast power and great achievements of the Czars. The quays of granite will for ever attest the prophetic conceptions and far-sceing sagacity of Peter the Great (5); the imperial palace, the facade of the admiralty, the colomiade of the Church of Cazan (4), are durable monuments of the lofty spirit and grand ideas of Catharine; while the Church of Isaac, destined to rival, if it

⁽¹⁾ Nap. in Las Cases, iv. 81, 82.

⁽²⁾ Lond. i. 182. Malte-Brun, vi. 510.
(3) These quays, built of vast masses of solid granite, are, beyond all doubt, the finest in Europe. All the principal buildings in the metropolis are assembled on their sides—the winter palace, the admiralty, the English quay.—Brenner, i. 82-83.

⁽⁴⁾ The dome of this noble church resembles that of St Peter's at Rome, and it has a splendid converg-ing colonnade in front, like its great prototype, of one hundred and thirty-two pillars. The interior rests on fifty-four beautiful pillars of grey granite, each of a single stone,-BREMNER, i. 98.

in misfortune, if the praises of servinide were not always suspicious; and if he subsequent conduct of the same functionaries, when the winds of adversity reached them, had not demonstrated that their present overflowing loyally was rather the result of anticipation of future and prosperous, than of superiority to past and adverse fortune (1)

But, though not insensible to these striking marks of devotion, and fully alive to the necessities of his situation, it was neither by the one nor the other that the attention of the Emperor was now rivoted. It was treason at Paris which occupied his thoughts—it was on the constitution of Milet that his eyes were fixed compared. This extraordinary event, of which the Emperor received intelligence shortly before he left the army in Russia, might well arrest his attention; for it placed beyond a doubt the sandy foundation on which, amids so many protestations of fidelity and devotion, his authorits, and the prospects of succession in his family, were rested. An obscure but most able man, of the name of Malet, whose restless and enterprizing character had caused him to be detained four years in custody at Paris, had conceived, in "raid dynasty; and, execution [2] He execution [2] He execution (2). No with himself, and lished, General Malet created governor of Paris, and a provisional government established, and various orders on the treasury were also prepared, calculated to deeped the doubts or shade the fidelity of the client persons to whome the train was to be first applied. Having taken these precautions, Malet with ease childed the loose surveillance under which he was detained, and, dressed in his uniform of general of brigade, presented himself at the gate of the barracks of the 2d regiment and 10th cohort, and being refused admittance till the colonick, Souther, gas erders, he repaired to the house of the latter, which was not far distant, and amounced to limit that the Frippers had been killed on the 7th October before Moscow, that the scance had taken its measures, and that he limiself had been appointed governor of Paris. The forged decree of the senate was well calculated to deceive one the rent aut merely general

use. Deceased or won, that officer gave into the snare, and accompanied Malet into the barrick-yard (5).

and great success of

The chief difficulty in the enterprize was here to be surmounted; and in the way in which he overcame it, Malet gave proofs of a vigorous character. He instantly assumed a decided tone-ordered the gates to be opened-mustered the soldiers by torch-light-announced the Emperor's death-and commanded the drums to beat, that the cohort should assemble to hear the decree read which announced the Emperor's death, and the abolition of the Imperial government. Yielding to the habit of obedience, suspecting no deceit, and habituated to similar changes during the Revolution, the soldiers obeyed without a murmur; the acquiescence of the chief of the battalion was already secured by the order on he treasury for 100,000 francs, delivered at the time, with the promise of future gratifications; the common men were paralysed by the fatal intelligence of the Emperor's death, and knew not how to resist orders apparently emanating from such elevated functionaries. Malet instantly ordered a strong body to march with him to the prison of La Force, which they forthwith did; and he there liberated Generals Lahorie and Guidal, who were sturdy republeans, of a bold character, and who had long been confined by order of Napdeon. They immediately set out with him, and took the command of the troops; and before daylight three columns had marched in different directions, under the command of Malet, Lahorie, and Guidal, to gain possession of the principal posts in the city (4.).

They were all successful beyond what their most sangine hopes nary success could have anticipated. Lahorie made straight for the lotel of Savary, the minister of police; forced his way into the louse, surprised the great functionary in hed, made him prisoner, and ifter some altercation, carried him off to the prison of La Force, where he was received and lodged in safety. Guidal, in like manner, made prisoner Paquier, the prefect of police, and lodged him in the same place of security. Stulier, the colonel of the 10th cohort, who had been gained by the bribe move mentioned, made himself master of the Hôtel de Ville, and stationer a strong force in the small square in front of that building; while another deachment, under Malet in person, took possession of the place Vendôme. Fochot, the prefect of the department of the Seine, was riding into town from lis country house at a quarter past eight in the morning, when he was met b one of his servants on horseback, in great agitation, with a note from the Hoel de Ville, on the outside of which were written the ominous words, " Fuit imperator." On arriving at the Hôtel de Ville he found the front occupied by he National Guards, and received a despatch from Malet, styling himself Governor of Paris, ordering him to prepare the principal apartment in the building for the use of the "provisional government." Frochot was a man of profity and honour; but, like many others of a similar character, he wanted the resolution necessary to carry him through such a crisis. Instead of simply discharging his duty, by declaring his adhesion to the young Napoléon, and andeavouring to induce the soldiers to abandon the blind enterprise in which they were engaged, he at once acquiesced, and even went so far as to desire the officers at the llûtel de Ville to arrange the tables and apartment for the provisional government (2).

Street et While the inferior leaders of the conspiracy were a hieving this Green of astonishing success, its chief was not less fortunate n obtaining, almost without resistance, the command of the principal military

⁽¹⁾ Thib. ix. 157, 158. Savary, vi. 19, 21. Trin, i iii. 147. (2) Sar. 31, 27, 23. Fain, i. 17, and Declaration of Count Frochet, i. 157. Thib. ic. 159.

32 overthrow of the government, occurring at the very time of the promulgation of the news of the Moscow disasters (1)

But if the narrow escape which the imperial government had Narolèon s nindergone excited anxions disquietude in the breasts of all classes (2), tenfold deeper was the impression which it made on the Con sell of State far-seeing mind of Napolcon One only idea took possession of his imagination-that in this crisis the succession of the king of Rome was, by the common consent, set aside One only truth was ever present to his mind -that the imperial crown rested on himself alone. The fatal truth, well known to the world in Instoric lore, but Intherto concealed even from his piercing eyes by the effulgence of his glory, had now been demonstrated, that the Revolution had destroyed the foundations of hereditary succession, and that even the greatest achievements by him who had won the diadem, afforded no security that it would descend to his progeny. These reflections, which seem to have burst upon Napoleon all at once, when the news of this extraordinary affair first reached him in Russia, weighed him down more than all the disasters of the Moscow retreat They constituted the secret reason for his leaving the army, they incessantly occupied his mind during his long and solitary journey, and they found vent in impressioned and mournful export being read, he resumed-" Itis is the consequence of the want of a work and proper ideas in Franco on the subject of succession Sad effects of our At the feel word of my death, at the first command of an unegiments to force the jails, and make

. jailer quietly encloses the ministers the capital, at the command of a few of state watmer his access ...

1 11 - the assembly of · ie empress is on isters and all the great officers of state are at hand Is a man, then, every thing here? Are institutions nothing, oaths nothing? It is to ideology that we are to attribute all these misfortunes at is the error of its professors which necessarily induced, and in fact brought on, the reign of blood. Who proclaimed the principle of insurrection as a duty? Who east adulation before the people, in elevating them to a sovereignty which they were meapable of evereising? When one is called to regenerate a state, it is principles diametrically the reverse which require to be followed thistory punts the human heart at is in history we must seek for the mirror of the advantages or exits of different species of legislation Frochot is an henourable mar but his duty was to have devoted himself "

de-Ville A great example is required for de this would be that of a soldier on the field of honour, if that of a magistrate - 1 11 clas s were not riore glorious still " lies to whom the examination

ously reported that the prefect

⁽¹⁾ This it 163 164 (2) Above all they were struck with the facility which the con p rators h d persualed the

Icerd therawives to be Ind against the persons us sers or figurer and without a more unsaw the of the department of the Seine should be dismissed. This was accordingly done, and the urban guard of Paris was suppressed; but the matter was pushed no further, it being justly deemed inadvisable to make it known with what facility the regular soldiers had been misled, and with what ease the imperial authority had been all but overtinned (1).

In France, during the monarchy, the people had for their rallying cry-"The King is dead! long live the King!" On this occasion, however, when the report of the Emperor's death was spread and believed, no one exclaimed, "Long live the Emperor!" The fact is memorable: it was the first indication of the effects, not only of a new dynasty on the throne, but of a new era in the social history of France. The period of hereditary succession, with its stability, its security; its loyalty, its recollections, had passed away: personal qualities had become the sole title to distinction. In the effort to effect this change, all Europe had been convulsed to its centre; but the alteration had been made, and it could not be undone. Now, then, was seen the effect of the shock on one of the most momentous of national events, the demise of the sovereign filling the throne. It too had become elective : personal qualities were alone the passport to power: the principle of hereditary succession had been destroyed. Even the greatest and most splendid qualities in the founder of a new dynasty, and the most unheard of success attending his arms, could not, it was found, ensure the succession of his own son, or shake the inextinguishable passion for a rotation of rulers, which had arisen from the principles of the Revolution. The effects of that great convulsion were already unfolding themselves; the throne had become in effect elective; all power depended upon office; all office on the support of the military; the support of the military on the suffrage of the Prætorian Guards at Paris. European had been exchanged for Asiatic civilization; and the dream of perfectibility had terminated in the institutions of the Byzantine empire.

Though Napoléon acquired the melancholy conviction, from this cerning the event, that the stability of his dynasty and the hopes of his son's succession rested on a sandy foundation, yet he resolved to leave nothing undone which might, for the present at least, guard against the dangers with which they were threatened. With this view, he resolved to fix at once, by an act of government, the cases in which a regency was to ensue, and the persons in whom the nomination was to be vested. By a senatusconsultum early in February, the right of appointing a regent was in the first instance vested in the Emperor: if he had not made a nomination, the right of doing so devolved on the empress; failing her, on the first prince of the blood; and in default of him, on the great dignitaries of the empire. The same decree fixed, in the most minute manner, the duration and extent of the regent's power, the formation of his council, the oath to be taken to the empress if regent, the administration, during the continuance . of the interregnum, of the royal domains, the forms for crowning the empress regent and the King of Rome. The object of the Emperor in this curious enactment, obviously was to arrange every thing for the transmission of the imperial authority, in the event of his absence or death, to the proper depositary, and to leave nothing to chance, or the inclinations of the military who happened to be in the capital at the time: forgetting that the real and only security for hereditary succession in the throne, is to be found in the reverence with which it is regarded by the people; that this reverence can neither Le acquired in a single lifetime, nor be engrafted on revolutionary changes, and that to seek to establish it in a state which has destroyed its hereditary ranks, and the descent of private property, can give no greater stability than casting anchor in a moving quicksand (1)

⁽¹⁾ Thib, ix, 166, 167. Fain, i. 168, 195. Pièces Just. etc. 20, 21. Audience of Dec. 20, 1812.

Well aware that the losses of the preceding campaign made a great erripting of effort necessary, Aspoleon resolved to take advantage of the first men voted moments of alarm and excitement consequent on the promulgation of the disasters, to demand ample levies of men from the Senate. "Great measures," said Regnaud St -Angely, the orator of government, "are necessary; what suffices to-day, may not be adequate to-morrow . the lnsolence of the conquerors of Louis XIV, the humiliation of the treaties of - - - thun ton mediate addition of three hundred and fifty thousand men to the armies, which were instantly and unanimously voted by the senate. The execution of the decree was entrusted to the war minster, and the conscripts were zealously furnished by the people. Some of the principal cities of the empire, particularly Paris, Lyon, and Turin, even went beyond these iminense levies, and voted regiments of volunteers to be raised and equipped at their own expense. Never did the patriotic and warlike spirit of the nation appear with more lustre, nor was the firmness of government ever more warmly seconded 5 mt mm f g 1] st

National Guard of 1812, a hundred thousand from the classes hable to conscription in the four preceding years, and no less than a hundred and fifty thousand from those arriving at the legal oge in 1814; that is, who were then only from eighteen to uneteen years of age (5).

The multiplied disasters of the Moscow campaign made the Empe-Appendix The initial price assesses of the belonging to an accommodation his arranges for feel the necessity of at length bringing to an accommodation his long-continued differences with the Holy Sec. With one half of Europe openly in arms against him, and the other but doubtfully arrayed under his banners, he could no longer afford to brave the hostility of the head of the Church. It has been already mentioned(4), that after the violent seizur of the Pope by the officers, and with the consent of Napoleon, and his passing of the Alos in July 1809, he was brought to Grenoble; from thence, he wa shortly after transferred to Savona, where he was rigorously treated, and for cibly severed from the society of all those, among the cardinals or their servants, who were suspected of being hostile to the interests of France (5). At the Holy See Nepoleon wet ler tated beyond mes sure at this resistance to his buthority especially agre at this resistance to his billioning experient from a capture and he gave sent to his ind guation in measures of the atmost severity. Lard ask fir-tro, t abretin and thous mis weres inmed stell and the second of the second of the second of the many in his home as good as

⁽¹⁾ Deeree Leb 5, 1813 Moniteur, and Thib is.

⁽¹⁾ herite 140 % 1010 bounteur, and 1810 is. 205 Mont vi 133 (2) Age vi 330 315 (3) Senatus Consultum, Jan 11 1813 Mon teur and Ed oborgh Review, vi. 19 Nov 5 Dec 2

Dec 18
(4) Ante vii 304
(5) The f Row ng is an instance of the treats

this situation was not deemed sufficiently secure after the Emperor had departed from Paris on the Moscow eampaign, he was at that time removed to Fontainebleau, where he was kept in confinement indeed, but a more dignified and respectable captivity. Though a prisoner, he had a handsome suite of apartments, was respectably entertained at table, and permitted to walk in the gardens of the palace, although he was still debarred from the society of his most esteemed attendants, lest they should encourage him in his resistance to the imperial authority. His occupations here were of the meanest description: age and long-protracted confinement appeared to have in a great degree weakened his mind; and the hands of the supreme Pontiff were not unfrequently engaged in the humble occupation of darning a stocking or hemming a garment (1).

Napol(ou's hidden de-In bringing the Pope so near to the French capital, and removing so studiously all those who were suspected of being of an indepensigns reguiding the Pope and the Catholic Church.

so studiously an account to the imperial interests, non applied
the Catholic Church.

his person, Napoléon was not actuated merely by the spirit of opand inflexible authority; he had great views, signs repression, or jealousy of a rival, and inflexible authority; he had great views, which were well matured, on the subject of the Holy See-its more intimate connexion with the French government—the influence which he might aequire over its members, and the more extended base on which, by such means, he might establish his own power. He not only had no jealousy of, but he cordially approved of every institution which tended to bring the minds of men into a state of due subjection to constituted authority; all he required was, that all these institutions should be placed under his immediate influence and control (2). With this view, he meditated the translation of the papal government to Paris; the extinction of its temporal dominion; its entire dependence on the French empire for revenue, and the consequent subjection of its chief to his own control; but having effected this, he had no wish to impair its spiritual authority; on the contrary, he was rather desirous to extend it. Like the Roman emperor, he was anxious to found his own authority not merely on temporal power but religious influences; to adoru his brows not only with the diadem of the conqueror, but the tiara of the pontiff; and as the forms of the Church prevented the actual union of both offices in his own person, he conceived that the next best system would be to have the Pope so situated, that he should be irrevocably subjected to his control. Napoléon says, "he wished to establish the spiritual authority of the Pope in France: he neither wished to profit by accidental eircumstanto Naples; and many of his most faithful servants made to share the captivity of Cardinal Pacca in the Castle of Penestrelles, amidst the snows of the Savoy Alps. No one was permitted to visit the Pope without the authority of the prefect of the department; he was interdicted in the most rigorous manner from any communication with his subjects in Italy, accompanied with a threat of a public trial and deposition in the event of contamacy. The state eprisons of France were filled with a crowd of ecclesiastics who made resistance to the violent encroachments of Napoleon on the jurisdiction of the Holy See; and to such contemptible chiffs was the imperial government reduced to break the conrageous spirit of the captive pontiff, that not only were his whole papers seized, and many carried off, one day when he was absent from home, walking in his little gradea with Berthier, the governor of his establishment; but he received infunction that the whole household, including him off, were to be put on the reduced allowance of five proli (nopence-halfpenn) aday: a measure of everity, however, which was only carried into execution for two weeks, as it was found that the good Catholics of Savora supplied the deficiency of the imperial treasury, by themselves furnishing to the pontiff provisions in abundance.

—See Artur. Vide Pope Pius VII, ii. 289; and Cardiaal Pacca, i. 37.

(1) Sav. vi. 49, 50. Atland, il, 302, 313. Pacca.

Mein. ii. 37, 39.

(2) "Don't be alarmed, bishop," said Napoléon to the Bishop of Nantes; "the policy of my government is intimately bound up with the maintenance of the spiritual authority of the Pope. I require that he should be more powerful than ever; he will never have as much influence so my policy requires he should possess." The bishop was astonished, and seemed to doubt the sincerity of the Emperor, but he spoke his real opinion; by translating the seat of the pipal government to Unit, he expected to acquire the entire direction of this formidable power; and he would willingly have augmented the awful character of the thunder of the Vatican, when he held in his own hand the means of directing its bolts,—See Naioléon in ces, to create a patriarchiship, nor to after the behef of his people: he respected spiritual affairs, and wished to rule them without touching them, or mingling in their concerns he wished to make them plant to his will, but by the intervention only of temporal influences. There were persons at Rome who san through his policy. They said, "It is his mode of carrying on war, not daring to assiultatin from, he has turned the Church as he turned the Alos in 4706, or Melas in 4800 (1)"

It spins for this end, he rehed entirely on the judgment of the Bishop of breasts. Nantes: whenever that learned prelate sand, "That attacks the Court of althous and the Church," he paused in his career. He felt assured of niltimate success, with the aid of time and the vast influence which he

of St -Louis Rome would have been in the ment of the court of Rome at Paris would have been fruitful in great political results, its influence on Spain, Italy, the Bhenish Confederacy, and Poland, would have drawn close the bends of the Great Auton, and that which the chief of the Church had over the faithful in England, Ireland, Russia, Priesia, Cambria, Hungary, and Boliemas, would have passed into the hands of the Emperor of France. So impressed was he with these ideas, and the immense addition to his influence which the papal authority would have given hun, that he would have done every thing in his power to extend the Romish that he would have done every thing in his power to extend the Romish recommendism, the foreign missions, and to increase the power of the clergy.

indants of the ponti-

arts, but in consequence of his specim or going. I should be an unique city, beyond all comparison with other capitals; the cheft-d'envire of science and art, the thest inuscums, all that had adorned the cheft of the cheft of

But the disasters of the Russian campaign cut short these splended personal to receive and awakened the Imperor to the necessity of immer with the personal transfer of the powerful bless with, and open arrival at Paris, he communeed the holmess on the beginning of the year a state its? I contained beautiful to return to the personal transfer of the received to the negotiations between the two with its direction on the part

(2) Dapoleon in Blouth. 1 151, 162

rant on that of the Pope. When Ivanced to render the personal presence of the Emperor desirable, he appeared suddenly at Fontaineblean with the Empress Marie-Louise, and immediately hastened to the apartments of the eaptive pontiff. Appearing to forget altogether that there had been any difference between them, he immediately embraced him, and without touching on matters of business, spent the remainder of the evening in the most agreeable and varied conversation. No man possessed the art of fascination, when he chose to exert it, in a higher degree than Napoléon, or was more eapable of dazzling the minds of his hearers by the charms of a seductive and entrancing discourse; and if these powers had acquired the mastery; at Tilsit, of a young and able Czar in the plenitude of his power, it is not suprising that they proved more than a match at Fontainebleau for an aged pontiff, whose intellectual faculties had been weakened by a long captivity and protracted misfortunes. No violence was either required or employed (1): the Pope and his attendants, charmed with this unexpected change in their fortunes, speedily fell into the snare which was so skilfully decked with flowers; and, six days after his arrival, the Emperor had the satisfaction of seeing the signature of his holiness to a concordat, which settled the principal points in dispute between the court of the Tuileries and the Holy See (2).

Extraordia. The Emperor testified, as well he might, the most extraordinary satisfaction at the eonelusion of this concordat, which not only tathis conclusion of the eitly ceded to him the whole ecclesiastical states in Italy, by stipulating nothing for their restitution, but in effect decided in favour of the eivil power in France the long-disputed question as to the ecclesiastical veto on the appointment of bishops by the temporal authority. Next morning, decorations, presents, and orders were profusely scattered among the chief persons of the Pope's household; the joyful intelligence was communicated to all the bishops; Te Deum was chanted in all the churches of France; all the restrictions upon the personal freedom of the Pope removed; mass allowed to be freely celebrated in the palace of Fontaineblean; a numerous body of cardinals soon after joined his holiness from their different places of exile; the concordat was solemnly published as one of the fundamental laws of the state; the Emperor loaded the Pope, and all the members of his court, with

(1) "Chateaubriand has alleged, in his celebrated Jan. 25. pamplet of Bonaparte and the Bourbons,' that Napoléon, in a transport of rage, seized the Pope by the locks, and maltreated him grievously. But the Pope, often interrogated on that subject, has invariably answered, that it was not true; nevertheless it was easy to perceive, from the strain of the Emperor's conversations which he repeated, that he had assumed a high tone with him, and even went so far as to tell him he was not adequately versed in ecclesiastical matters,"—Mémoires du Cardinal Pacca, ii. 87.

(2) Thib. ix. 197, 198. Pacca, ii. 81, 85. Artaud, ii. 315, 321.

Articles of the Coocorprovided, 1. That the Pope shall exerted the Coocorprovided, 1. That the Pope shall exerted the Coocorprovided, 1. That the Pope shall exerted the Coocorprovided the Lingdom of Italy, in like manner as his predecessors have done. 2. His ambassadors, ministers, and charges d'affaires, shall enjoy the same immunities and privileges as the members of the diplomatic body. 3. The domains of his holiness, as yet analicnated, shall be exempted from all sorts of taxes; those already alicnated shall be replaced till their revenue amounts to two millions of francs, (L. 80,000.) 4. In the six months which shall follow the notification of a nomination of a bishop by the Emperor, the Pope shall give the necessary induction to the bishopric. In the event of no such induction being given by his holiness during that period, the archbishop of the district, whom failing, the senior bishop within its limits, shall proceed to give the necessary induction, so that in no event shall any bishopric be vacant more than a year. 5. The Pope shall appoint, both in France and Italy, to certain sers, to be afterwards fixed upon by the contracting parties. 6. The six suburban dioceses shall be restored, and put at the disposal of his holiness. 7. The holy father, in regard to hishopries in the Roman states, from which the incumbents are absent by the force of circumstances, shall exercise his right of nomination in partibut. 8. The Emperor and Pope shall concert measures, at the proper time, for the reduction of the hishopries in Tuscany and the Genoces states, as well as for those to be established in Holland and the Hanseatic departments. 9. The offices of propagandism, of the penitentiary, and the archives, shall be established in the residence of the holy father. 10. The Emperor awards a free pardon to the cardinals, hishops, priests, and laity, who have incurred penalties from past events. 11. His holiness consents to these conditions, from the confidence which he has in the good dispositions of his majesty to the numerous wants of the Chorch, in the time in which we live. [See the Cancordat in Martin's Sop. i. 552; and in Artaud, ii. 323.]

place of those of force; and render liberty impossible, by leaving in the ruling classes in the state no power which can repress the sallies of wickedness, but the empire of the sword,

But other cares than these disputes with the Church now occu-Napoléon s med the Emperor, and preparations were necessary for a graver contest than that with a captive pontiff and his enthralled cardinals. Russia was approaching, Prussia was preparing to shake off the yoke; the fermentation in Germany presaged an awful contest on the Rhine Napolcon prepared to meet it with a gravity, resolution, and candour, which are worthy of the highest admiration. The legislative body met early in February, and the speech of the Emperor made no attempt to disguise the losses of the Moscow campaign, or the imminence of the present dangers "Success the most brilliant," said he, "in the first instance, attended our arms; but the excessive rigours and premature approach of winter brought frightful calamities on the army. In a few nights I beheld every thing changed; I have experienced great losses, they would have broken my heart, if in such circumstances I could have been alive to any other considerations and for lating of my neonle. The agents against their me a prey to the lirst victim of the passions she would spread among others. The joy of our enemies, and above all, of England, has reached its height; but misfortunes have proved the strength of the empire . the energy of my people has brought them back to a more just appreciation of things. My differences with the French dynasty essary. On four difns, I have solemnly the horrors of civil war, but Providence has determined that she shall be lude a treaty but on empire(1)." ied by such a statistical detail of the statistical and huancial situation of the empire, as almost justified the confident tone of the Emperor, notwithstandwhich is ing the disasters of the Russian retreat. According to the exposé published by M. Montalivet, minister of the interior, the population of that part of the empire which embraced the territory of Old France, was 28,700,000 souls, an amount not materially different from what it was at tho commencement of the Devolution (2); a remarkable result, when the vast consumption of human life which had since taken place, from the internal bloodslied and external wars of the Revolution, is taken into consideration. but which hardly warranted the assertion of Montalivet, singularly ill-timed amidst the universal mourning produced by the Moscow retreat, that " the conscription itself, which every year made the elite of the youth rally round the standards of the empire, had contributed to the increase of the population, by multiplying the number of marriages, and favouring them, because it fixed for ever the lot of the young Frenchman who had obeyed the law on this subject " It had fixed their lot, it was universally observed; for it had consigned them to their graves. In other respects, however, the report exhibited a more gratifying and less questionable picture of the growing wealth and increased productions of the empire (5); and the details are curr-

⁽¹⁾ Mousteur, Feb 14 1813 Th b in 204 205 (2) It was then estimated at 25 000 000 a bet no creet enumeration of the inhabitants had been position was considerably below the real numbers of the people (3) 71th, ix 205, 205 Monlieur, Feb 15 1813.

-1

ous and interesting, as presenting a singular example of the extent to which a great expenditure by government, accompanied by a strong internal administration, a tolerable protection to property, and the stoppage of external competition, can increase the industry of a country, even in the midst of the most unbounded system of foreign hostility (1).

In one respect, the report of the minister of the interior contained authentic details, in which the government of Napoléon is worthy of universal imitation. It appeared, that during the twelve years which had elapsed since he ascended the consular throne, the sums protections, harbours, public edifices, etc., amounted to the enormous sum of a thousand millions of francs, or L.40,000,000, of which seven hundred millions, or L.28,000,000, was the proportion belonging to Old France. When it is recollected that an expenditure so vast, on objects to truly imperial, amounting

I. VALUE OF PRODUCTIONS IN ACRICULTURE.

2,300,000,000 or 92,000,000

230,000,000 quintals of grain, . .

4,000,000 hectolitres wine,	-		-	-	•	•	•	2,000,000,000		0210001000
	•		•	•	•	•	٠	800,000,000		32,000,000
Woods,	•	• •	•	•	•	,	•	100,000,000	_	4,000,000
Lint,	•		•	•	•			50,000,000		3,200 000
Uil,								250,000,000
Tobaceo,								12,000,000		150,000
Silk,			i			Ĭ.		30,000,000		1,200,000
Wool, 120,000,000 lbs. equal to				•	•	•	•	100 000 000		£ 000 000
Careases of slicep,	•	• •	•		•	٠,	•	120,000,000		5,200,000
Annual increment on 3,500,000 hors	•		•	•	•	:	٠,	56,000,000	_	2,300,000
3 our old have	203,	V1Z.,	20	ω,	voo	101	ır (75,000,000		3,000,000
year old horses,	٠.	• •	•	•	•	•	ر ب	10,000,000		010001000
Annual consumption of horned cattle,	٦iz	, 250	,00	O C	UNS	an	id į	464 000 000		C 400 004
oxen, 2,500,000 calves,	•				٠		٠, ٢	161,000,000	_	6,400,000
Skins of these animals,							. '	36,000,000		1,500,000
Milk, Dutter, and cheese.					-	•	•	150.000,000
4.900.000 pigs annually consumed.	_			•	•	•	:
Minerals,	•	• •	•	•	•	•	•	274,000,000
Coals,	•	• •	•	•	•	•	•	50,000,000		2,000,000
560,000,000 of pounds of salt,	•	• •		٠	•	•	•	50,000,000		2,000,000
Fruits vogotality at at	•	• •	•	•	•	•	•	28,000,000	_	1,120,000
Fruits, vegetables etc, etc.,	•	• •	•	•	•	•		450,000,000		18,000 000
		Total	5,					5,032,000,000	_	201,400,000
~ 7	τ.	R1				_		-,,,		,,
City as a c	.1.	Manu	LV	LTL	IKE	s.
Silk Manufactures,		٠.						84,000,000		3,360,000
Woollen do								210,000,000
				Ť	Ť	•	•
Cotton goods.	Ī		•	•	•	•	•	139,000,000
	•	• •	•	•	•	•	٠	225,000,000
orass, coarse linen, ple	•	• •	•	•	•	•	•	70,000,000		2,800,000
Beer brewed,	•	• •	•	•	•	•	•	82,000,000	_	3,280,000
	•	• •	,	•	•	•	•	40,000,000	_
New branches of industrial	•		٠	. •	•	•	•	60,000,000	_
New branches of industry, with various)us	lesser	art	iclo	:5,	•		65,000,000
										=10001000
Operations on the a								985,000,000		39,140,000
Operations on the rude material as lin	nen	, colte	n,	do	th.			639,600,000
			•			•	•	000,000,000	_	25,600,000
Total manufacturing industry, .		٠.	_					1 694 600 000		PF 000 000
į ·									_	65,000,000
Foreign and demonstrate	GN	AND]	Oor	IES	T16	· C	n ve	UTDCT
Foreign and domestic commerce, .							U (1)	thiton.
8" " " tomastic commerce,	•	• •	-	•	•			378,000,000	_	14,700,000
Total agriculture,		Sum	mar	γ.				,		22,100,000
Do Manufacture,	•		•					5 039 000 000	_	000 400 000
						•	•	5,032,000,000
Foreign commerce and lesser branch	es.	. \ .		Ĭ	•	•	•	1,624,600,000	_	65,000,000
	- 7	•	•	•	•	•	•	378,000,000	_	14,000,000
0	drar	ıd Tot	-1							00. 100.000
_		201	413	•	•	•	٠	7,034,600,000
Exports in 1810.
	•	٠,						376,000,000	_	15,040,000
	•				-	-	•	604 044 000
Report of Montalives, 27th Feb, 1813.	C -			_	-		•	200,000,000	_	20,000,000
, 1813.	GOI	DSAL	n's	Re	eeu	il, 🕆	γi,	77, 84, 144.
				•

to nearly L 3,500,000 a-year, took place during a period of extraordinary

tary remevements, mark him as one of the most marvellous of mankind It would be deserving of unqualified admiration, were it not deeply sullied by the recollection, that sums so vast could be drawn from the imperial treasury only because nearly half the expenses of government were laid on the conquered or allied states (1), that it was the maintenance of three hundred thousand French veterans in Spain, at the expense of the wretched people of the Peninsula, and two hundred thousand in Germany, at the cost of the impoverished inhabitants of Prussla, which alone enabled the Emperor to direct so considerable a portion of his revenue to the internal improvement of his dominions, and that I rance was embellished by works of utility and magnificence, and Paris adorned with the splendour of decoration, because we unheard of desolated the Peniosula, and oppression unbearable had roused an unconquerable spirit of revenge in the German provinces (2)

In one particular, unconnected with military or political events, but deeply interesting to the lovers of the fine arts, this report ed fices at contains details of the utmost value. The cost of all the public edifices in Paris, as well as of the great roads over the Alps, and noble harbours constructed by Napoleon at Antwerp, Cherbourg, and other places is given so far as actually expended, with the estimates of the total cost to bring them to completion To the traveller who recollects the unbounded admiration which these public worl's and edifices have awakened in his mind, it is an object of interest to ascertain the cost which they have soverally occasioned, and he will find with surpriso that they have in great part been reared at an expense not exceeding that of edifices of little or no excellence in his own country, even although the charges of building are not materially different in the two countries. So true it is, that the most essential elements in architectural beauty, genius and taste in the architect, are beyond the power of mere wealth to command, that it is not money to construct beautiful huildings, but the mind to conceive them, which is generally wanting, and that it is to the pure taste and noble conceptions of the artists of southern Europe, rather than any great excellence in the materials at their command, or the wealth of which they have the disposal, that their remarkable superiority to those of this country is to be ascribed (3)

The financial and military resources which this memorable report Employer unfolded as being still at the disposal of the I reach government Empire at this priod were immense, and strongly indicated the magnitude of the colossus which combined Europe had still to combat, even after the Russian

(1) See reports in Falux Camp de 1813 5 80 81; and Goldson h Recue I vi 77; and I on our Feb 15 1813

(2) The expend ture from 1800 to 1812 was thus class field in the report of 31 Montal vel :-

France Imperial palaces Fort first ons 62 000 000 - 2 480 000 111 000 000 --$ 760 000 Mar time harbours 117 000 000 -- 4 680 000 277 000 000 -- 11 150 000 Poeds 21 000 000 -- 1 210 000 Be dges Canale and dra ning 123 000 000 --4 920 000 103 000 000 --Embeli shment of Paris 4,010 000 119 000 000 -- 5 960 000 Public build ags in the prov a es

203 000 000 - 40,270 000

To et, 15 3. The following account of the exima edito that and hims a matter expended on the principles

Mith respect to the mistary and naval resources of the empire, it ergor the contained information that could more implicitly be relied on The population of the French empire, augmented as it now was by Belgium, Holland, the Hanse towns, and Roman states, amounted to forty two millions, of which twenty eight millions seven hundred thousand be longed to Old France. For were the military and naval resources of the empire on a scale inferior to the numerical amount of its inhabitants, on the contrary, they greatly exceeded them. The horses it contained were three millions and a half, and consumed as much food as thirty millions of people. The army numbered in all eight hundred thousand infantry, a into consideration, unparalleled in any former age or country of the world. But it was altogether disproportioned to the resources, vast as they were, of

```
Receip s to set Jan 48 $
                                                  F ac 5
                B ou_ht forward
                                             171 377 362
                                               2 706 387
     Adm nistrat on de dous es-Dro to ord na rea
                                              64 931 621
  Droits extraord na res
                                              25 474 574
                                              33 779 237
  Dro to sur le sel
    Té e des dro ts rem 1-Dro ts ord pa res
                                           115 335 770
  Tabacs
  Loere
                                              10 058 031
                                               4 708 656
  lo es
  Sels et tabaes au delà des Alpes
                                               3 881 070
  Salmes de l Est
                                               3 900 000
                                               1 000 000
  Ma no e Paulres et salpe res
  Mirte
                                              7 445 034
  Recei es d verses et ace dentelles
                                               1 701 396
  Recettes exter cures
                                              36 000 000
                                             780,959 847 or L 31 23 000
            Total Rece ols
                                              II Execute twan
  Dette publ que et pens ons
                                            142 040 313
  Liste e y le y con it a les pr nes
                                             P$ 000 005
    Franca s
  Grand juge ma re de la just ce
                                             25,653 216
 Relat o is exterleures
                                              8 361 29+
                                             58 546 028
  Intér eur
  F suces
                                             23 367.943
  Tresor impe al
                                               S 367 859
  Guerre (m n st re)
Guerre (adm n trat on)
                                             29. 761 866
137 712 915
  Mar ne (y compr a le supplément accord par le deer t du $ avr l 1812).
                                            142 022 183
  Cul es
                                              16 627 825
  Pol ce genérale
Fra s de ne<sub>n</sub>ot at ons
Iu da de reserve
                                              1 631.341
                                              $ 566 600
                      Talal
                                            952 658 TT2 or 1..35 146 000
-Exercis 1812 As int Jan 1813 Connen ve vi 461 115
  (1) Th
```

s force was thus d stributed	3166
"6 re, ments of the guard	60 0
152 do, of a dan ry	6100
37 do offght stastey	210
15 do of art Hery	68.D
36 but all one of wa gons tra a end heavy ort lery	32 00
86 reg incu t of caralry	100 00
15 fort an battalio :	12 00
	975 00

the state: it was more than double of that which Rome, at its highest point of elevation, maintained out of three times the number of inhabitants, and larger than China supports out of a territory ten times, and a population according to the lowest estimate, four times, as large as those of the French empire. In a word, it implied the permanent absorption of one in forty of the whole population in the profession of arms; whereas it has never been found by experience that an empire, how powerful soever, can for any length of time flourish with more than one in a hundred engaged in such pursuits (1).

Notwithstanding the great losses which the French marine had And of its sustained since the commencement of the revolutionary war, it had again, by the indefatigable exertions of Napoleon, been raised to a most formidable state; such a state, indeed, as clearly indicated the perseverance of the Emperor in his grand design of ultimately combating England hand to hand on her own element, and terminating the war, in his own words, by a battle of Actium. From fifteen to twenty ships of the line had for several years past been launched annually at the different dockyards of Antwerp, Brest, Cherbourg, Toulon, Flushing, Genoa, and Venice; and the naval force of the empire had by this means been increased to one hundred and four ships of the line and fifty frigates. As the commercial navy of France was entirely ruined, this large fleet was manned by means of the maritime conscription. which, levied in the principal marine departments of the empire, furnished annually twenty thousand recruits for the sea service, who were sedulously trained to their duties in the roadsteads and harbours of the principal seaports, by which means nearly an hundred thousand sailors were constantly maintained in the service of the state (2).

Though it was, doubtless, but a slight apprenticeship to the duit threatened ties of seamanship which could thus be learned, yet the perseverance of the Emperor in this great design of gradually raising up his navy to a level with that of England, and avoiding all encounters till this was done, marks the decision and energy of his character, and indicates the serious nature of the ultimate struggle which awaited the British empire, if the prosecution of this project had not been interrupted by the disasters which occasioned his fall. And though England, with a fleet of two hundred and forty sail of the line, and eight hundred frigates and smaller vessels (5) which at that period bore the royal flag, might well disregard even these considerable efforts, yet experience has proved that, with a popular constitution, no permanent reliance can be placed on the dominant multitude possessing foresight and self-denial sufficient to keep up a naval force adequate to the exigencies of so vast an empire. And it will, probably, not be deemed by future ages the least remarkable facts of the fifty eventful years which followed the French Revolution, or the least characteristic of the influence of government on the national fortunes, that while the navy of France, through the multiplied and unceasing disasters of the war, was increased by the vigour of the executive from seventy-two ships of the line at its commencement (4), to one hundred and four at its termination; and while that of England rose, amidst her gigantic expenditure, during the same period, from one hundred

⁽¹⁾ Rome, in the time of Augustus, with a population of 126,000,000, had an army of 450,000; Russia at present, with 60,000,000, has 710,000 in arms; China, with 170,000,000, a nominal force of 914,000; but more than half of this immense body are mere militia, like the Prussian landwehr, who are only occasionally embodied, and are not permanently withdrawn from the labours of agriculture.—See Girron's Rome, ch. i.; Barri's Geographie Universelle, 637 and 822.

phie Universelle, 637 and 822.
(2) Fain, Guerre de 1813, i. 95.
(3) Balbi's Geog. Univ. 633. James' Nav-' tory, vol. vi. App. No. 4.

(4) Ante, chap, vii.

on the Oth Becombon 1919 and and the wreck of the grand army could hardly muster thirty thousand bayonets Meanwhile the Russian troops were rapidly advancing, the dispositions of Prussia, as will sneedily appear, were more than doubtful, and it was easy to foresee, from the intense national spirit which burned beyond the Rhine. that the defection of the court of Berlin would be followed by an ammediate crusade from the whole warble and robust population of the north of Germany In these circumstances, an extraordinary effort was necessary to provide resources against the danger, and nothing but the utmost vigour in the Emperor, and patriotic spirit in the French people, could furnish the means of preserving the national independence. The receipts of the year 1811 had fallen 27,000,000 francs. (L 1,080,000), those of 1812, 57,000,000 of francs, (L 1.450,000), short of their estimated amount. The taxes, both direct and indirect, had reached their maximum, the experience of the two last years having proved that an increase of taxation produced no corresponding augmentation in the receipts of the exchequer. The extinction of commercial wealth had rendered the raising supplies by loan impossible. It was with a sinking revenue, therefore, a taxation which had reached its limits, an ex-1 . - and a - nol cred t that France hal to make

m as resto disasters, and the fortifing, noth which the Lubbilled but, up a grost them, are worthy of the highest admiration His first care was to restore the cavalry and artillery horses, a sufficient number of pieces of cannon existed in the argenals, and as the French empire contained 5,500,000 horses. st was not found a difficult matter, by offering high prices, to put on an effeetive footing these essential branches of the public service, though the want of skill in the riders rendered them but ill qualified to contend with the nu-Apr 13 1813 merous and veteran cavalry of the Allies To repair the chasms occasioned in the ranks, and make head against the hourly increasing force of the enemy in the north of Germany, 180,000 men, in addition to the great levy of 550,000 already ordered (2), were placed at the disposal of the ments of 1 rance stood as follows -

	Acc sgc 1 cight 1804 31 1 cs	Average height 1810 Met es
Hautes Alps	1 623	1 $87
Captal	1 660	1677
Creu e	1 398	8 567
lle et Vila ne,	1 638	1 570
La det	1 614	3 574
Virme	1 513	£ 589

All un ler fire feet two inches Fingi så

It may fouly be in 1 if at the stable speaks vo-lences as to the cruck effect of the wars of Aupol on on the plays oil well be no of manh? I shad the learned author from whom these extracts are made correctly ever bes to the same cause the continued lower ug of the structured in the next generation " Les calculado mon les due tableau proucent que pour avoir 1 000 treerres pendant la persode de Frans 1804 and 1810 in the following a x depart- 1823 h 1833, on a da prononcer, dans to to la France 526 example one pour ranges per ques de toute soiner. Co resultat seratt planne t su l'on co sava I que les jeunes gera des classes qui ont serra de base à nos calculs eta ent nés de 1805 à 1813 epoque ou les grandes guerres de l'emp re entre na est le populet ou val de hors du terr toure. La longue pe X aufas tre par les mail suseux év princes de 1815 et and a tee per less mall murant év nemens de 1815 et le 1 enette propriest din penjle qui co astronde au un rometimi pour la severe des résultits père a-ford des describes que la comparation de la consideration for descente que de la comparation de l'éct of the wars of Nepsicos out the physical resource of the French popula som aud the stiture of the re-lation te mury to the Medices of a trings when friend a well known sensiter of the 3 pittle fas-

Il Merivale Esq aftue loner Temple (1) Thib. is 207 205 Fein 1 28 29 Sec of minister of war-viz. 80,000 of the first ban of the National Guards, who had already been embodied, disciplined, clothed, and put on permanent duty in the frontier fortresses, during the Russian war; 90,000 conscripts, drawn from those liable to serve in 1814, and 10,000 guards of honour. Now were seen the good effects of the sagacions foresight which had prompted Napolcon, at the commencement of the campaign of 1812, to call into active service so large a portion of the first ban of the National Guard, drawn from the classes liable to the conscription from 1807 to 1812; nearly 100,000 men of mature years and confirmed strength, ready disciplined and equipped, were in arms, in the fortresses on the Rhine, to recruit the army in Germany; and to their exertions the victories of Lutzen and Bautzen are mainly to be ascribed. Very different were the young conscripts, drawn from those liable to serve in 1814. who constituted the remainder of the infantry force added to the standards. Called into active service a year before they had arrived at the legal age, and torn from their parental homes before they had acquired either the steadiness or the strength of manhood, they were wholly unable to withstand the iron veterans who had, in the Russian bands, survived the campaign of 1812. Great numbers of them disappeared from the ranks, or sank into the hospitals, before they reached the Elbe; and in the confusion and disorganization which pervaded the army before it even saw the enemy, was to be found too sure an indication that the empire had reached the limits of its physical strength, and approached its fall (1).

(2) day to

To give consistency to this brave but motley array of young troops. Levy of the gardes a'honneur, the Emperor drew from Spain the four remaining regiments of the Imperial Guard which were still there, a legion of veteran gendarmerie, and a considerable body of Polish light horse. In addition to this, the skeletons of a hundred and fifty hattalions, consisting of the most trusty and experienced officers and non-commissioned officers, were despatched from the Peninsular legions to the Rhine; and, without materially weakening the forces in Spain, they proved of incstimable importance in conferring efficiency upon the new levies. In addition to this, two extraordinary measures were adopted to repair the wide chasms in the artillery and cavalry forces. By the first, forty thousand sailors or naval gunners were drafted from the marine service, and transferred to the artillery of the land forces; while their place was supplied by the young seamen whom the maritime conscription rigorously levied from the inhabitants in the neighbourhood of the scaports. By the second, a corps of ten thousand horsemen was raised on an entirely new plan, from the flower of the population of the empire. Both officers and privates, who were alike drawn from the higher classes of the people, were to be equipped, dressed, and mounted at their own expense. In return for such sacrifices, they obtained the pay of the chasseurs of the guard, and after twelve months service the rank of a sub-licutenant; and when the campaign was concluded, such of their number as were most distinguished were to be formed into companies of the body-guards; a corps in an especial manner entrusted with the personal attendance on the Emperor. In this way Napoléon succeeded in obtaining at little expense, and by the prospect rather of future distinction than present advantage, a body of ten thousand horse, raised exclusively from the more opulent classes of his subjects. In this measure he had, however, a secret object of still greater importance in view, which was effectually attained. These young men were so many hostages for the fidelity of their parents and relations, occupying for

⁽¹⁾ Senatus Consultum, April 3, 1813. Moniteur, April 4, Say, vi. 41. Goldsmith, vi. 273.

I renon cuaracter; uut the youths, for the most part mexperienced, and riding on horses as raw as themselves, were hitle qualified for the rude encounter of the fluscovite or Gossack horsemen; the fatigues of the campa, speedly proved faul to their unformed constitutions; and before the alli-

were made to bring forward the conscripts, and enlist volunta

tion for the recruits; every man capable of bearing arms was forwarded fro the dépôts in the interior to their respective regiments; a large body of m of the n r place regular soldiers in the ranks of the grand army. Two thousand of the gen armeric in the interior were distributed among several new regiments' cavalry, which were formed from the sons of the postmasters and the force ticipated all the demands of the Emperor. The princes of the Rhenish confideracy received the most pressing orders to complete and forward to the precise of the with white which with white which we have the complete and forward to the complete and the complete an he middle of April, not only were the preparations on all sides in a great state of forward ness, but six lundred pieces of cannon, two thousand eassons, and above two hundred thousand men were converging from the Blinea and the Alps t

the banks of the Elbe (2)

the proper of the com munes for the public exigencies of his situation, Napoléon fell upon an expedient, which, thought savoired much in appearance of revolutionity spoliation, was yet essentially distinguished from the measures of the Constituent Assembly and Convention, by the compensation which it provided for the parties whose property was seized. Justifying the proposal by the necessities of the public situation, the minister of finance, Count Molé, proposed that a public law should authorize the sale of all the heritable property belonging to the monitorable property, public hospitals, and commanies; the treasury receiving the price, and the incorporated bodies interested being insertifed, for the amount of the price received, as creditors in the books of the public fonds. Landel property was to be exposed at the rate of the ruty, houses of fifteen years' purchase. So considerable was the corporate property still existing in the cmpire, that it was calculated its sale would produce the large sum of 570,000,000 francs, or nearly L.15,000,000. To encourage intending purchasers, onesixth of the price only was to be paid down at the purchase, another sixth in three months, and the remaining two-thirds at remote periods. The orator, in making this proposal, compared Napoléon to Charlemague, "ordering the sale of the useless herbs in his gardens, when his hand was distributing . to his people the spoil of conquered nations." But, lest any unpleasant enquiries should be institued by a refractory legislature into the produce of these sales, or the distribution of these spoils, it was announced that "the deputies of all the provinces of the empire should come to the capital to receive every three years the accounts of the public revenues;" indicating thus, in no equivocal manner, that the legislative functions of the Chamber of Deputies were to cease, and that they were to be assembled only at the interval of years to give a formal sanction to the public expenditure. Molé concluded, after a review of the flattering condition of the empire, with these words: "If a man of the age of the Medicis, or of Louis XIV, were to revisit the earth, and at the sight of so many marvels, ask how many ages of peace and glo- ... rious reigns had been required to produce them, he would be answered, twelve years of war, and a single man (1)."

⁽¹⁾ Senat Cons Apr 13 1313 Moniteur vThib. (2) Jose 16 235 279 Sev vi. 41, 42 Thib. vi ix 237, 239 Sev, vi. 41, 42 Fais, 1 35 37 233 239 Fels, 1, 35 38

A small proportion only, however, of the funds calculated upon from the sale of this corporate property, was actually realized. The the finanwhirlwind of disaster in which the French were involved at the sures, and arbitrary close of the year, and the invasion of the Allies in the spring following, both prevented the completion of the sales, and the collection even of the ordinary revenue, in a great many provinces. By successive decrees of the 11th and 16th November, 1815, large additions were made to the indirect taxes, particularly on salt, and the droits réunis; as also thirty additional "centimes were added to the direct taxes. The produce of these different sources of revenue was estimated at 109,000,000 francs, or L.4,440,000; but the burden was merely nominal: little if any of it was actually levied. All sorts of violent expedients were adopted to raise money; and by the admission even of the partizans of Napoleon; the imposition of arbitrary and illegal - taxes became usual (2). The overthrow of the imperial arms in Spain and Germany, and the refluence of its legions over the Rhine and Pyrenees, at once prostrated the financial affairs of the empire; for they threw the troops upon the resources of France itself, and, hy putting an end to the requisitions on foreign states, and the system of making war maintain war, at once revealed the total disproportion between its financial capabilities and its military establishment (5).

⁽¹⁾ Mole's report, Feb. 5, 1813. Moniteur, and Goldsmith, vi. 141,142 Thib. ix. 209, 210.

Count Mole's speech contained some details regarding the progress of the great work of forming a cadastre, or general valuation of the lands of the a cadastie, or general valuation of the lauds of the empire, to regulate the public assessments which Napoléon had so much and so justly at heart. It was begun in 1808; but such was the immensity of the labour with which the work was attended, that in 1813 little more than a fifth of the territory of the empire was completed. The progress already made, however, showed clearly the importance of which were not less achitrary in other departments; empire, to regulate the public assessments which Napoléon had so much and so justly at heart. It in 1813 little more than a little of the territory of the empire was completed. The progress already made, however, showed clearly the importance of the undertaking, the weight of the French direct taxes, and the frightful inequalities which, from its want, existed in the collection of the revenue. "Out of 47,000 communes," says the report, [&]quot; 10,000 have been measured; and of these 10,000 6000 valued. The cadastic has already proved, tha the land-tax does not exceed an eighth part of the net resenue of the properties; and, nevertheless, or which were not less arhitrary in other departments; but the difficulties of the crisis rendered them un avoidable."-Savars. vi. 40.

⁽³⁾ Thib. ix. 213, 214, Sav. vi. 40, 41.

(Cnab. LXVIII. HISTORY OF EUROPE. 50

French character; but the youths, for the most part mexperienced, and riding on horses as raw as themselves, were little qualified for the rude encounter of the Muscovite or Cossack horsemen: the fatigues of the campaign speedily proyed fatal to their unformed constitutions; and before the allied 1).

the depôts in the interior to their respective regiments; a large body of marines were formed into a division of infantry; and the second han of the national guards, called into permanent duty in all the frontier provioces, re-armeric in the interior were distributed among several new regiments of cavalry, which were formed from the sons of the postmasters and the forest guards throughout France, and a reinforcement of seven thousand horse thus were made to mins, forward inc conscious, and count voice ary by Napo were made to mind to water and bearing arms was forwarded from recruits; every man capable of bearing arms was forwarded from placed their comrades of the first ban, who had now taken their place as regular soldiers in the ranks of the grand army. Two thousand of the gend-

J ... it primared nary

chase. So considerable was the corporate property still existing in the empire, that it was calculated its sale would produce the large sum of 570,000,000 francs, or nearly L.13,000,000. To encourage intending purchasers, oncsixth of the price only was to be paid down at the purchase, another sixth in three months, and the remaining two-thirds at remote periods. The orator, in making this proposal, compared Napoléon to Charlemagne, "ordering the sale of the useless herhs in his gardens, when his hand was distributing . to his people the spoil of conquered nations." But, lest any impleasant enquiries should be institued by a refractory legislature into the produce of these sales, or the distribution of these spoils, it was announced that " the deputies of all the provinces of the empire should come to the capital to receive every three years the accounts of the public revenues;" indicating thus, in no equivocal manner, that the legislative functions of the Chamber of Deputies were to cease, and that they were to be assembled only at the interval of years to give a formal sanction to the public expenditure. Molé concluded, after a review of the flattering condition of the empire, with these words: "If a man of the age of the Medicis, or of Louis XIV, were to revisit the earth, and at the sight of so many marvels, ask how many ages of peace and glorious reigns had been required to produce them, he would be answered, twelve years of war, and a single man (1)."

A small proportion only, however, of the funds calculated upon from the sale of this corporate property, was actually realized. The the finanrial meawhirlwind of disaster in which the French were involved at the sures, and arbitrary close of the year, and the invasion of the Allies in the spring following, both prevented the completion of the sales, and the collection even of the ordinary revenue, in a great many provinces. By successive decrees of "the 11th and 16th November, 1815, large additions were made to the indirect taxes; particularly on salt; and the droits réunis; as also thirty additional centimes were added to the direct taxes. The produce of these different sources of revenue was estimated at 109,000,000 francs, or L.4,440,000; but , the burden was merely nominal: little if any of it was actually levied. All sorts of violent expedients were adopted to raise money; and by the admission even of the partizans of Napoleon, the imposition of arbitrary and illegal . * taxes became usual (2). The overthrow of the imperial arms in Spain and Germany, and the refluence of its legions over the Rhine and Pyrenees, at once prostrated the financial affairs of the empire; for they threw the troops upon the resources of France itself, and, by putting an end to the requisitions on foreign states, and the system of making war maintain war, at once revealed the total disproportion between its financial capabilities and its military establishment (5).

⁽¹⁾ Mole's report, Feb. 5, 1813. Moniteur, and Goldsmith, vi. 141, 142. Thib. ix. 209, 210.

Count Mole's speech contained some details re-

Count Mol's speech contained some details regarding the progress of the great work of forming a cadastie, or general valuation of the lands of the empire, to regulate the public assessments which Napoléon had so much and so justly at heart. It was begun in 1808; hut such was the immensity of the labour with which the work was attended, that in 1813 little more than a fifth of the territory of the empire was completed. The progress already made, however, showed clearly the importance of the undertaking, the weight of the French direct taxes, and the frightful inequalities which, from its want, existed in the collection of the revenue. "Out of 47,000 communes," says the report, [&]quot;10,000 have been measured; and of these 10,000 6000 valued. The cadastre has already proved, that the land-tax does, not exceed an eightle part of the net resenue of the properties; and, nevertheless, on, proprietor pays a thud, and another not a fifteenth; an incredible disproportion, which the cadastre is intended to rectify."—Court More's Report, Fobrary 5, 1813.—Monitour.

(2) "It was at this period that the commencement of imposts, plainly illegal, took place. It was about the same period that measures were adopted,

^{(2) &}quot;It was at this period that the commencement of imposts, plainly illegal, took place. It was about the same period that measures were adopted, which were not less arbitrary in other departments; but the difficulties of the erisis rendered them un avoidable."—Savara. vi. 40.

⁽³⁾ Thib. ix. 213, 214. Sav. vi. 40, 41.

The national resources of the French empire, as they were deveterest of this loned in these memorable reports, and evinced in these strengous of the Em evertions, are the more worthy of attention, that this was the LAST Napoleon a Exposition of them which was made to the world—this was the political testament of Napolcon to future ages. The disasters which immediately after crowded round his sinking empire, and the extraordinary dif ficulties with which he had to contend, prevented any thing of the kind - 13 - 1-1 being subsequently a ged from the chaos all its revolutionary sessed little more than two-thirds of the territory, and not a fourth of the influence, which it had emoved under the Emperor To the picture exhibited of the empire at this period, therefore, the eyes of future ages will be constantly turned, as presenting both the highest point of elevation which the fortunes of France had ever attained, and the greatest assembling of national and military strength which the annals of modern times have exhibited

Wooderful, however, as its strength was, and worthy as the efforts the Emp e made by France at this period to repair the disasters of the Russian note the stand as its campaign, and assert the national independence, are of the highest admiration, and clearly as they will over rack this among the brightest cras of its long and glorious annals, to the solier eve of historic observation it was already apparent, what the event soon demonstrated, that, though overflowing with the martial passions, and not yet wholly drained of the physical strength of war, the empire was almost destitute of that durable resolution, that disinterested ardour, which, springing from a seose of moral obligation, independent of individual ambition, prepares men to discharge their duty alike in the shade of adverse'as in the sunsline of prosperous fortune The forces of the French empire, honever vast and unprecedented, were stimulated by no other passions but those of temporal ambition, the power of the Emperor, immense as it was oned its ascendency entirely to the influence of worldly success. While victory attended their efforts, the hosts of warriors who clustered round the linperial eagles were faithful to their sovereign, brave in arms, indefatigable in exertion but it is not while "faunced by conquest's crimson wing," that the real mouses of human conduct can be made apparent. Ambition then often produces the same effects on external conduct as devotion, selfishness as patriotism, the passion for distinction as the heroism of duty. It is adversity which is the real touchstone of mortality, it is the breath of affliction which lays hare the human heart. The inhabitants of France since the Revolution have ever been unable to stand this searching ordeal, that dreadful event closed the fountain from which alone the strength to endure it could have been derived Resplendent when glittering in the sunshine of victory, invincible when fanned by the gales of conquest, the empire of Napoleon ert at are t es, the withered wantenduring rage can supply the want of ramparts, no shepherds of Tyrot, that patriotism can inspire the rudest breasts with heroic devition, no finnes of Moscow, that the splendour of civilization can co-exist with the energy of the desert All the springs which the world can furnish to sustain the fortunes of an empire, were in full activity, and worked with consummate ability but one has nanting, without which, in the hour of triat, all the others are but as tinkling brass-a belief in God, a sense of duty, and a faith in immortality

CHAPTER LXIX.

RESURRECTION OF GERMANY.

ARGUMENT.

Immense Sensation produced in Europe by the Moscow Campaign—Unbounded transports in Prussia and Northern Germany-Cruelties inflicted on those engaged in Schill's Conspiracy —Enormous pecuniary Exactions levied by the French in Prussia—Great impression which the Moseow Campaign produced in that country-Convention of General D'York-Embarrassments of the King, and his Disavowal of the Convention-Progress of Events in Prussia-Measures of D'York to gain time-Retreat of the French Army through Lithuania to . Prussia—Continued Retreat to the Oder—Abandonment of the Army by Murat—Able Measures of Eugène to arrest the evil-The Russians pass the Oder and occupy Berlin, and the French retire across the Elbo-Death of Kutusoff, and Occupation of Berlin by the Russians—Departure of Frederick William from Berlin, and great Levy in his Dominions—Universal and noble outbreak of patrictic spirit iu Prussia—Extraordinary rapidity with which the Army was Recruited—Admirable Organization in Prussia, which turned this spirit to the best account—Continued Difficulties, and Indecision of the King—Manner in which Napoleon received the pacific Advances of Prussia-Treaty of Kalisch-Energetic military measures adopted by Prussia-Progress of the Negotiation between that country and France -Real Motives of the War in Hordenberg's Proclamation-Auswer of Moret on the part of France-Additional Conventions of Kalisch-Ineffectual Attempts to induce Saxony to join the League against France-Failure of all attempts of the Allies to gain over Saxony-Negotiations with Austria-First Measures of Austria after the Moseow Retreat-Secret Negotiation between the Cabinet of Vienna and England-Austria begins to arm, to give weight to her Mediation-Announcement by Austria of an Armed Mediation, and arrival of Count Narbonne-Austria more decidedly inclines to the Covition-Remonstrances of Napoléon against the Austrians, and Metternich's Reply-Negotiations with Sweden and Denmark-Treaty of Orebro between England and Sweden-Accession of Denmark to the side of Napoleon-Negotiations between the Allies and Murat-Energetic Measures of Prussia in support of the War-Fermentation on the left-bank of the Elbe-Formation of the Landwehr and Ladsturm in Prussia—Positions of the French on the Elbe when the Russians crossed it -Disposition and Numbers of the French Troops in the Fortresses on the Vistula and tho Oder-Disposition and Strength of the Prussian Forces-Forces and Position of the Russians-Occupation of Hamburg by the Allies-Insurrection in Bremen, and Defeat of Morand at Lunenburg-General Insurrection between the Elbe and the Weser-Advance of the Allies to the Elbe-Wittgenstein's approach to that River-Combat of Mockern, and Retreat of Eugene across the Elbe-Napoléon's Measures before setting out for the Army-His Arrival at Mayence, and great Preparations there-Napoleon's efforts to Augment his Forces at that point-Bad condition of the Cavalry and Artillery-Forces of Napoleon at this period-Inferiority of the Allies at the opening of the Campaign-Aspect of the Russian Troops which cutered Dresden-Appearance of the Prussian Troops there-Noble Spirit by which they were animated-Habits of the Emperor and King at Dresden, and respect which they both paid to Religion-Confusion and Disorder on the French Line of March-Approach of the two Armies to each other-Position and Measures of the allies-Combat at Posarna, and Death of Marshal Bessières-Movement and Position of the French-Allied March and Plan of Attack-Eattle of Lutzen-Commencement of the Action, and success of the Allies on the Right-Napoléon's Measures to Repair the Disorder-Counter-movements of Wittgenstein-Napoléon hastens to the Right to restore the Battle-Prodigious efforts of both Parties at the decisive Point—Conflict of the Berlin Volunteers and French Conscripts— Final Charge of the French Guard-Night Attack of the Allied Horse on the French Lino Aspect of the Field of Battle-Loss on both Sides, and Reflections on the Battle-Retreat of the Allies to Dresden—Beautiful Appearance of that City on the Approach of the French-Entry of Napoléon into Dresden-His Preparations for the Passage of the Elbo A Passage is Effected at the Capital—Return of the King of Saxony to Dresden, and his final Adherence to the Cause of Napoléon—Alarming State of the Negotiations with Austria -Mission of Count Bubna to Dresden, and Stadion to Bautzen-Napoléon's Secret Proposals to Russia at this period—Forces of the opposite Armies at Bautzen—Description of their Position there. of their Position there—Reconnoissance of Napoléon, and Disaster of Ney's Wing on his Lest—Balanced Success of the French there—Disposition of the Allied Army in their Position—Congress Aspect of their Position Po tion—General Aspect of their Position—Passage of the Spree, and Commencement of the

FULLAR generations of men, hving under the shadow of their streets of the screets of the screet of the screet

Europe by the result of the Moscow campaign The calamity was too great to be

Paris demonstrated to the world that he regarded his ormy os jutually destroyed, and that all his hopes were centred in the new host which he was obout to collect in the I render empire. The broken brids and woful crowds which here to destroy of a render that he was obout to collect in the I render empire. The broken brids and woful crowds which hereit of every thing, in tattered garb, and with hearth asserts.

stroyed, and that all his hopes nore centred in the new host nuter he obout to collect in the I renel compare. The broken hands and notal eronds which, bereft of every thing, in tattered garb, and with haggird visiges, ounded

fare were forgotten; and even the least sanguine ceased to despair in a cause in which Providence itself appeared to have at length declared against the aggressor, and the magnitude of the disaster he had sustained was such, that aggresses, and the magnitude of the measurement is repair the sensed to be beyond the power of lumman evertion to repair the measurement and its and to be power to burdens, regarded this portentions event, what must face been more than the power of lumman events of the set of the power of lumman events of the set of the power of lumman events of the set of the power of lumman events of the set of the power of lumman events of the set of lumman events of lumman even in the cup of the vanguished, had been compelled to wear the colours and serve in the ranks of the oppressor, and strive to rivet on others the sate chains by which itself was enthrilled,—in Germany, in which every not be heart and every interpol arm had been long corolled in the secret bands of zina, seemed to have been sent by a special messenger

the Tugendbund, and where nothing was wanting but a leader and royal standard to occasion a general and irresistible outbreak against French oppression. Ever since the abortive attempt at liberation in 1809, the severity of the imperial rule had been materially increased in the states of Northern Germany. Mutual distrust prevailed. The French authorities, aware of the profound hatred with which they were universally regarded, sought, by additional acts of cruelty, to strike terror into the vanquished. The Germans, seeing no end to their miseries, sought refuge in deeper and more widespread conspiracy, and submitted to present suffering in the anticipation of approaching vengeance (1).

Abominable acts of cruelty had added a yet deeper hue to the cased in selection with which the government of Napoléon was regarded, from the never-ending weight of the military contributions. Twenty citizens of Vienna had been shot before the French armies evacuated the town, to repress the general effervescence; and eleven officers of Schill's corps, all belonging to the first families at Berlin, had been executed for their adherence to his cause: they died, after embracing each other, singing patriotic hymns. But their fate, deplorable as it was, became soon an object of envy to their companions in that heroic enterprize, whose lives had been spared; all the volunteers in the Queen's regiment, the noblest youths in Prussia, were conducted with a chain about their necks, to the great depot of galley slaves at Cherbourg, and there employed in common labour in the convict dress, with a four-and-twenty-pound bullet fastened round their ankles, amidst the common malefactors, without being permitted any communication with their parents, or their even knowing whether they were dead or alive; while the never-ending demands of Count Daru and the French military authorities, still exhibited claims to the amount of nearly a hundred millions of francs (L.4,000,000) for unpaid arrears of the war contributions of Prussia, to the account of which they refused to ascribe upwards of ninety-four millions of vouched payments, or furnishings in kind, extracted at the point of the bayonet from that unhappy country in the course of the Moscow campaign (2).

The pecuniary exactions which had been made from Prussia, and the requisitions in kind, which had been extracted from its unleved by the French in Prussia. Were not attested by contemporary and authentic documents. From these it appears that no less than 485,000 men and 80,000 horses had traversed Prussia in its whole extent, in the first six months of 1812, and that more than one-half of this immense force had been quartered for above three months in the Prussian provinces. By the convention, 24th February 1812, the furnishings made for its support were to be taken in part payment of the arrears, still amounting to nearly a hundred inillions of francs, which remained unpaid of the great military contributions of 640,000,000 francs, (L.24,000,000,) levied on Prussia after the battle of Jena (5). But though the French authorities, with merciless rapacity, made the new requisitions, they

(2) Capef. Hist. de l'Empire, viii. 248, 249. Hard. Report, March 16, 1813. Fain, ii. 246. The eleven noble Prussians thus unworthily sa-

⁽¹⁾ Capefigue, viii. 218, 249. Hist. de l'Empire, Hard. vii. 12, 15.

The eleven noble Prussians thus unworthily sacrificed to the jealous apprehensions of Napoléon, were in the first instance brought to Verdun as prisoners of war, but from thence they were speedily conducted to Wesel, where they were delivered over to a military commission, and sentenced to be shot. The judgment was pronounced at noon; but hefore six in the morning their graves had been dug in the fosses of the citadel. When the executioners were about to hind one of the victims named Widelle to his brother, he evelaimed. "Are we not already sufficiently bound by blood: and the cause in which we are engaged, to be spared this last act of insult?—See Defense des Officiers de la Troupe de Schill, par M. J. N. Piewez, leur défenseur, Luége, 1814, p. 29.

(3) Ante, vi. 142.

never could be brought to state them, in terms of the treaty, as a deduction from the old ones. The French host, like a cloud of locusts, passed over the country, decouring its whole subsistence, plundering its inhabitants, and wrenching from them, by the terrors of military execution, the whole cattle, lorses, and carriages within their reach. The number of the former carried off, before September in the single year 1812, in East Prussia alone, amounted to 22,700; of the cattle to 70,000, while the carts seized were 15,549. The weekly cost of Junot's corps of 70,000 men, quartered in Lower Silesia, was 200,000 crowns, or L. 50,000, and all the rest of the army in the same proportion. These enormous contributions were exclusive of the furnishings stipulated to be provided by the state, by the treaty of February 24, 1812, which were also rigidly exacted (1); and of the arriers of the great contribution of 1806, the collection of which had become, from the total exhaustion of the country, allogichler hopeless (2).

Mosco + Mosco + composina

had sent full powers to General D'York, their commander, to act occording to circumstances. Meanwhile the agrication in the capital daily became more violent, every successive arrival from the army, brought fresh accounts of the accumulated disasters it had undergone; and at length the oppearance of the woe-stricken furthers who entered, the precursors of the Dec 22 1812 deathlike mutilated bands who followed, left no doubt that an unheard-of catastrophe had occurred (5) Augereau, who commanded there, was so much olarmed by the sinister reports which these scattered fugitives diffused among the inhabitants both of the metropolis and its garrison, that he wrote to the Emperor that it would be expedient, in order to be able at once to stille any insurrectionary movement, to establish a newerful corden of troops in the principal towns on the Oder In the midst of the general agitation, however. Frederick William and his able minister Hardenberg continued perfectly tranqual; and both Augerean and the French ambassador Saint-Marsan wrote to the Emperor, that they had no reason to complain of their conduct, and that the cobinet of Berlin would remain firm to the French alliance (4). But the stream of events was soon too violent to be name correspondibly which one could scarcely help to be a human learn go or if and started were the features; the 1 ps were rotted away the country to the started away the started away the started from before

FORTER 25 Kenney June 31 1813 Acres

magen any dem Ref e magliouren la lerefen preten melt pour l'avanteu l'avenue 3 de reed 1843 (4) Augrecon to Berth et Dec 27 1812 and 61 Magento to Napolion Jun 4 and 12 1812 Fard 3 1 17,83

sockete It was awfully historical put a size a more horr bestud was to present itself. Octof the a raw in the bottom of the ear I now behelf a fi dilemma the King remained, though with a heavy heart, faithful to his honour Jan 5 1813 and the French alliance : orders were immediately despatched to supersede General D'York in his command; which was conferred on General . Kleist: the former was put under arrest, and ordered to Berlin to stand his trial, while the latter was directed to conduct the Prussian contingent as rapidly as possible to the head quarters of the grand army | Meanwhile Hardenberg. desirous to turn to a good account the present extraordinary crisis, and to regain for Prussia some part of its ancient splendour in return for its fide-sian centingent in the Emperor's service to sixty thousand men (4). There can be no doubt that these proposals on the part of the peror's power, they conceived that Austria, restrained by the marriage of Marie-Louise, would remain firm in the Prench alliance, and that France, far from being overthrown, would soon rise more powerful than ever (2) Aapoléon, however, very naturally recollecting the injuries which Prussia had received of his hand, and supposing that the protestations on the king's part were entirely hypocritical, and that the convention had been concluded agreeably to his secret instructions, did not accede to these propositions; ady cast, immediately on the receipt ordered the great levy of three hunhas been already mentioned (5), and

meanwhile the march of events in Prussia was so rapid as to defeat all hisman calculation, and whirl the government, willing or unwilling, into the dangers and the glories of war (1).

Manner of D' York, whose firmness of character was equal to the hazardous part which he had to play, while his prudence was adequate to its delicacy, had no sooner received a copy of the Prussian Gazette of the 19th, containing the king's formal disavowal of the convention, and his own thisrolssal from the command, than he published a counter proclamation, in

⁽t) St. Marsan to Due de Eassano, Jan. 5 and 12. 1813 Fain, 1 207 212 Hard all/43 14
(2) "The King of Prueda at this time was for from rejecting France as overthrown; he believed lo spate of secret assurances to the contrary that Austria would remain firm in the French a lance He resisted only any further pecantary exercises which had become impracticable; but promised if

I e got money to raise 50 000 or 60 600 men for the service of the Emperor anneancing at the same time, that if his country became the seat of an inso recet on It would speed by astend to ad Lorence my "-H. saccore. a : 13 14

⁽³⁾ detr la 31

⁽⁴⁾ Hard wil 44. 15 Proclamman of Jin 17 1313 Fon 6 217

which he declared that the aide-de-camp, Natzmer, who was said in the Gazette to have been sent with these orders to Kleist, with directions himself to enforce them, had not arrived either at the headquarters of that general nor at his own; and that, as he could not recognize the authenticity of a printed gazette, he would continue his command till formally superseded. In this resolution he was unanimously supported by his troops; who remained inactive under his orders within the Russian lines; and the non-appearance of the aide-de-camp with the formal orders made it probable, that the King was now at length preparing to take a decided part, and that the defection of DiYork would possibly become the prelude to an abandonment by the cabinet of Berlin of the French alliance (1).

In truth, such had been the magnitude of the French overthrow, Retreat of the French and the rapidity with which the Russians had advanced in their army through pursuit, that the north-east of Germany was almost denuded of and Prussia their troops, and amidst the exulting shouts of the inhabitants,: he Russian advanced guards were already appearing amongst them. Such and been the havor which had been made in the French array, that out of six jundred thousand combatants who, from first to last, had entered the Rusian territory with the grand army, only forty-two thousand had re-crossed the Niemen, of whom not nineteen thousand were native French (2). Murat, whom the Emperor had left in command of the army, led back those shattered bands through Lithuania to Konigsberg and Dantzic; while Schwartzenberg retired by a diverging line to Pultusk, in order to regain the Austrian frontiers, so that both by position and subsequent policy, the two Imperial hosts were irrevocably separated from each other. Wittgenstein, with the advanced guard of his corps, crossed the Niemen, and entered the Prussian territory in the middle of December (5); and it was his advance—while cutting off the communication between Macdonald's

(1) D'York's declaration, Jan. 27, 1813. Fain, i. 210.

(2) The details of the survivors of the wreck of the Grand Army, when compared with those who entered the Russian territory, are very curious : they are as follow :-

Troops which entered from first to last, vide Ante, viii. 3 Deduct Schwartzenberg's corps	28,	G47,158
Macdonald's ditto		66,645
Grand Army of Napoléon, properly so called		580,513
Recrossed the Niemen.		, *
. l. Freuch.
Imperial guard		•
2. Allies. Saxons. Bavarians, including 3,000 in Thorn. Vestphalians. Wirtemburghers. Baden and Hessians. Poles, without the garrisons of Zamose and Modlin. Saxons. G,000	23,400
Total who escaped.	42.200	42,200
Lost in the Moscow campaign.		538,313
CURTIN V 450 - 3 D		0001010

⁻See Severtt, x. 179, and Prorno. Camp. de 1813 and 1814, ii. 437, and Fain. i. 61. (3) Schoell, v. 183, 184, Jom. iv. 220, 221. Fain, i. 63, 64.

corps, which was blockading Riga, and the remains of the grand army, religing towards Dantzic—that reodered necessary the retreat of the former, and gave rise to the convention with D'tork already mentioned, which led to such important results.

The French generals were at first hopeful that they would suct that they would suct that the Prussians, and the just apprehensions which that occasioned as to their communications with France, joined to the exhausted and demoralized state of the troops, soon rendered jt apparent that this was impossible. In truth, the activity of Writgenstein gave them no lessure for preparation. On the last is a first that the same and an an an analysis of the product of the product to these troops early to February, and they continued their march without opposition, every where received with enthusiasm as deliverers, through Old Prussia The second column, composed of Platoff's Cossacks and some light cavalry, moved to the left of the former, straight on Dantzie, where it arrived on the 2fth January, and immediately commenced the block ade of that important fortress. The third, under the orders of Tchi chagoff, advanced through East Prussia, and arrived in the middle of January at Marienburg The fourth, under Tormasoff's command, were with the headquarters of the Emperor Alexander, and the commander inchief hutusoff, recently and worthis invested with the title of Prince Autusoff Smoleosko it arrived at Plozi early in February, having advanced from Wilna through Lithuania The fifth, under the direction of Ililaradowntch, Sacken, and Doctoroff, followed a diverging line to the southward moving by Gradno on Jalonke, following the footstens of Reguler and Poniatonsl 1, who retired towards the Upper Vistula while Schwartzenberg, unable to contend against such an mundation of hostile forces, concluded a separate convention, in virtue of which. Regnier was allowed to retire towards Saxony, and the Austrians, in like manner, were permitted to withdraw without disturbance into Gallicia. The whole force of these five columns comprised eriginally a bundred and ten thousand men, but such was the reduction of numbers in the Russian main army, from the ravages which fatigue and the severity of the chimate had made in their ranks, that not more than thirty-five thousand men could be assembled round tho headquarters of the Emperor Alexander which arrived at halisch in the en l of February, and remained there till the beginning of April (2)

It would have been a difficult matter even for Moréau or Turenne, between at the head of the mutilated and discouraged remains of the French army, to have maintained their ground on the Vistula against a Victorious though grievously reduced body of enemies, advancing over an extended his of above two hundred miles in breadth, but Murat was totally

(s) The Buss in warriors have wrenged the lafamous area o of the eterritory they have send his ed the enemy who loundated it sand may are inadequate to the task. Brave as his own sword in the field, and gifted with the eagle eye which could seize with advantage the most favourable direction for a charge of horse, he was utterly destitute of the moral courage, extensive combination, and enduring patience requisite for a general-in-chief entrusted with an important command. Disaster succeeded disaster during the brief period of his direction. The advanced guard of Wittgenstein surprised Marienwerder near the Vistula on the 46th January, where Prince Eugène bad his headquarters, and with such success, that the prince only succeeded in cutting his way through by desperate efforts, and with the loss of six hundred killed and wounded, and a thousand prisoners. The line of the Vistula, thus broken, and menaced by the doubtful temper of the Prussian people in rear, could no longer be maintained. Six thousand men were hastily thrown into Thorn, eight thousand into Modlin, and four thousand into Zamosc; while a motley group of stragglers, hardly a half of whom were in a condition to bear arms, crowded in Dantzic, where they sought refuge behind formidable ramparts, and were brought into some sort of order under the stern rules of its governor, Rapp. Meanwhile Murat, who had retired to Posen, in East Prussia, more than a hundred miles in the rear, despairing of the salvation of the army, and conceiving the time was come, when every one, in the wreck of the Emperor's fortunes, should look to his own interest, suddenly threw up his command, and set out by post for his own dominions in the south of Italy. Napoléon justly stigmatized this desertion of his post by the commander-in-chief at such a crisis as a decisive indication of his want of moral resolution (1), and gratitude to his benefactor. "I suppose," said he in a letter to Murat, "that you are among the number of those who think that the Lion his dead: if so, you will find that you are mistaken. You have done me all the mischief in your power since my departure from Wilna; your elevation to the throne has turned your head. If you wish to preserve it, conduct yourself properly (2),"

. He have no other al ect but to conquer a der rable

Eugène, upon whom the command was thus reluctantly forced at this perilous erisis, did all that coolness and resolution could Eugene to - suggest to stem the torrent of disaster. His first eare was to fix the headquarters at Posen, and keep them there for three weeks, in order to give an'opportunity to the stragglers to come in, and communicate a certain degree of order to the retreat, which was daily more rapidly turning into a flight; but the mischief already done by the dislocation of the army was irreparable, and the forces under his command, after the loss of those left in garrison on the Vistula, were so inconsiderable, hardly amounting to fifteen thousand men, that he was in the end compelled to fall back to the Oder. Nor did the garrisons left on the Vistula effect in any degree the desired object of retarding the enemy: notwithstanding the number of men, little short of thirty thousand, who were under his command in Dantzic, such was the misery and destitution of their condition, that Rapp was unable to attempt any external operations to retard the enemy. Thorn and Modlin were merely blockaded by the Russian reserves under Barelay de Tolly. A sufficient number were assembled before Dantzie to keep its garrison in check. Warsaw was, early in February, evacuated by the Austrians, who retired from the whole grand duchy of Lithuania, which was immediately occupied by the Russians; while the main body of their force still pressed on

^{(1), &}quot;The king, your husband, abandoned the army on the 16th. He is a very brave man on the field of hattle; but he is weaker than a woman or a monk when he does not see the enemy. He has no moral courage."-Narolion to his sister Caroline, Queen of Naples, 24th January 1813. Fain, i. 65.

(2) Napoléon to Murat, Jan. 26, 1813. Fain, i. 65, 66. Hard. xii, 80. Thib, ix, 195.

HISTORY OF EUROPE. with unconquerable vigour, though in the death of winter, towards the Oder.

Winzingerode, with a large detachment of Russian horse, soon ther exertook Regnier and his Saxon infantry at halisch : a sharp conflict ensued, which terminated in the overthrow of the Saxon foot, who were irrevocably separated from their horse, the former-being driven back in the direction of Glogau on the Oder, while the latter were forced to an eccentric terred by the fort of Gzentoschau towards the southern parts of Poland, where they sought protection under the shelter of the retiring Austrian columns. Eugène, perceiving from these disasters that he could no longer mainstain his position at Posen, broke up from thence on the 12th, to arrive

ed on the - 1 - 1 - 5 - 6

Which were still in the hands of the French, to be able to make mean against the Russians, until the arrival of the great reinforcements which Napoléon was raising in France (1).

The line of the Oder: liewever, notwithstanding all these advant-The Ruty ages, proved as little capable of being made good as that of the Vis-- - 1 - -- 1 of Wittgetistein's sed the Oder at ile Winzingerger possible cither ill directions, or to fermentation Eunossession of Bernin, new m'al tarti a 0 I Mirch

Wittenberg, and cantoned them belind the Libe. Supported by the strong fortresses of Torgau, Magdeburg, Wittenberg, as well as the intrenched camp of p end den famous in the Seven Years' War, and the feebler ramparts of advance; and not more than twenty thousand or traied into Prussia There, accordingly, Eugene collected his forces, and terminated his long and mournful-retreat from the Niemen, a distance of nearly four hundred imiles; while by drawing to his standard the whole from in Pomerania, as well as all the Saxons and Havarians who were within reach be contrived to muster nearly forty thousand men for the defence of the grea military harrier of the Eibe, even after deducting the garrisons left in the fortresses on the Oder (2). and by their pro and achieved the overthrow of the mightiest armament of which history has preserved a record, terminated his eventful career. His constitution, already almost exhausted by the hardships and fatigues, of the campaign, there sank under an attack of the malignant typhus fever, which, springing as usual from the effects of famine and misery, had hung upon the traces of the retreating French army, and already begun to spread out in that frightful epidemic, which proved as fatal to their ranks as the snows of Russia, and for the next four years visited and spread its ravages through every king-'dom in Europe. The Emperor of Russia was much embarrassed in the choice of his successor : the claims of Barclay de Tolly, whose immortal retreat from the Niemen to Borodino had gained for him the admiration of every military man in Europe, while his generous and unabated zeal in the public service, under the orders of Kutusoff, had proved that his patriotic spirit was equal to his military ability, being balanced by the distrust which the soldiers entertained of him as a foreigner, who had not yet been rendered illustrious by any signal victory, and whose principal achievement had been that of retiring before the enemy. Moved by these considerations, Alexander, though with reluctance, relinquished his desire to reinstate him in the supreme command, and conferred it on Count Wittgenstein, whose gallant stand on the Dwina liad contributed so powerfully to the success of the campaign, and whose recent exploits on the Berezina had inspired the soldiers with that confidence which brilliant triumphs, if accompanied by tolerable conduct, seldom fails to produce. His first steps were eminently calculated to increase this favourable disposition. Following up the retiring French columns, he approached 'the Prussian' capital: the Cossack advanced-guard traversed Berlin on the 4th of March, amidst the enthusiastic shouts of the inhabitants; and on the 11th the head-quarters of the whole army were transferred to that city, while Cara St.-Cyr, with all the troops he could collect on the Lower Elbe, threw himself into Hamburg: the whole right bank of that river was evacuated by the French troops, and Magdeburg and F. Wittenberg became the principal pivots on which the Viceroy's army, charged with the defence of the upper part of its course, rested (1). Departure of Frede-rick Wil-liam from It was impossible that this rapid and uninterrupted course of success, inducing as it did the liberation of the whole Prussian nam from monarchy from the grasp of the enemy, with the exception of a great levy few blockaded fortresses, should not have had an immediate and powerful effect on the dispositions of the Prussian cabinet. The first indications of the disposition of Frederick William to set himself free from the fetters with which he had so long been enchained, was evinced by · his sudden departure from Potsdam, where he then resided, on the night of the 25d January, for Breslau, where he arrived on the 25th. The motive of this journey, however, was not by any means to break at once with France; on the contrary, the vehement sallies against that country which , were breaking out on all sides, were repressed by order of the court, and every effort made to restrain the open declaration of the national feeling, " now become so excited as to be almost incapable of repression. The real object of the monarch and his cabinet was, to place himself in a situation where he was no longer exposed, as at Berlin, to the danger of seizure by the French generals; and where, in a place of at least temporary security, he could pursue those measures which, by putting Prussia in a respectable posture of defence, might enable it to take advantage of the present crisis to recover a por-ensued, which terminated in the overthrow of the Saxon foot, who were inrevocably separated from their horse, the farmer being driven back in the direction of Glogau on the Oder, while the latter were dreed to an eccentric retreat by the fort of Exentoschau towards the southern marts of Poland, where it behind the Elbe. Supported by the strong.

⁽¹⁾ Aperçu de la Camp. de 1813, 27, 28, Jom. iv, 262. Schoell, x. 186, 187.

W. Le . . .

Pears' War, and the feether ramports of Dresden, it was hoped they might at length make a stond, the more especially as the Russians necessarily left behind a number of men during their rapid advance; and not more than twenty thousand of their troops had yet penerated into Prussia. There, accordingly, Eugène collected his forces, and terminated his long and mournful retreat from the Kiemen, a distance of

be spice ander still remained at half-ch, hutusoff, following on the trace-of the retreating enemy, advanced his headquarters to Huntzlan; but there that gallant veteran, whose sword had delivered Hussiain the extremity of its peril,

(1) Jain, L. 70, 72, Schoell, R. 156, 157, Jun. (2) Jun. 4v, 251, 202 Fals, L. 72, 73, Schoell (v. 223, 225, tion of its lost territories and fallen consideration in Europe. The hiog individually, however, still inclined to the French alliance, from a sense of support a powerful army of sixty thousand meo. But in order to support these offers, and put Prussa in a condition to stipulate advantageous terms with either party to which it might ultimately incline, worlike measures of the most decisive kind were adopted by the government. By a royal decree, rea i dated Breslau, February 5, an appeal was made, on the preamble that the country was in danger, to young men of all ranks, from the age of seventeen to twenty-four, not subject to the legal conscription, to enter the army, in order to form companies of volunteers, to be anoexed to the regiments of infantry and cavalry already in the service, declaring, at the same time, that no young man between these years, who had not served in the ranks in one or other of these ways, should obtain any honour, distinction, distinct war By an edict on the day following, it was declared, that though the previous decree had fixed the age from seventeen to twenty-four as that in which service was in this manner required, yet it was not thereby intended

al mint from the en eramons

In order that the calmentations of royal displeasure if backwardness was maintained evinced, no exhortations to stand by their country in the hour of possible their country in the hour of possible their country in the hour of training the intentions of government were not yet authentically known, and a degree of uncertainty, in fact, at that period persaded the councils of the cabinet of Berlin which the nation httle suspected, yet many facts had

the state of the s

have been in the centre of the French power, joined to the invitation to the whole youth of the kingdom to rally round the national standard, on the so-ferm autonomement that the country was indeport—all conspired to spread an invitival belief that the disasters of Jean and Auerstadt might yet be effaced, and that the last stake for autonal substitution was about to 1 et brown the receibble was the ardour which this conviction exerted among the Prinssian youth. The young men of all classes, brave, ardent, and impetuous as their ancestors in the days of Arminius and Witikind, had been excited to the very highest degree of indignation by the unbounded license and rapacity which, under the imperial banners and by the imperial authority, French cupidity had so long exercised in every part of the country. Now was the appointed time; now was the day of salvation. And nobly did the Prussian youth on that crisis discharge their duty to their country and mankind. Could old Frederick have risen from his grave, he might well have been proud of his people; and the patriots of every future age will recur to it as one of the brightest spots in the annals of history (1).

On all sides, and in every direction, there was one unanimous cry nary rapidi- for arms. Such was the rapidity with which the volunteers crowdded in, that the government functionaries, so far from being in a which the condition to serve out to them military weapons, were not even able for a considerable period to inscribe their names. Nine thousand enrolled themselves in Berlin alone, in the first three days; a city not, at that period, containing above a hundred and eighty thousand inhabitants (2). The same spirit prevailed in every part of the country. Universally, the villages were filled with robust multitudes crowding in to enrol their names as volunteers; the school-houses in the rural districts, the offices of the municipality in the burghs, were surrounded, from morning till night, with dense masses, demanding arms to save their country. The generous ardour burned with peculiar vehemence in the youth at the universities, a very numerous class in Germany, and among whom the associations of the Tugendbund and the Burchenschaft had spread far and wide the utmost enthusiasm in the cause of their country, and the most unbounded hatred of French domination (5). The ministers of state—Stein, Hardenberg, Dohna, and Scharnhorst—were secretly allied to these associations, and did their utmost to emancipate the mind of the King from the bonds by which he still conceived himself tied to the alliance with Napoleon; while their agents-Professor Jahn, Ficht, Arndt, and Massenbach-more openly fanned the patriotic flame (4), and produced that unbounded enthusiasm which made Prussia rise as one man at the call of the fatherland.

But patriotic ardour and devotion, however important elements Admirable organization in military strength, are not of themselves capable of creating an army: discipline is necessary; training is required; previous orgaspirit to the nization and preparation must come to the aid of present courage and enthusiasm. In these vital particulars, without which their utmost efforts at the moment would, in all probability, have proved entirely unavailing, Prussia already stood pre-eminent; and the wisdom of her government had provided both the framework in her army, and the practical experience among her people, capable of at once turning the whole strength of the nation to warlike achievement. The admirable system has already been

⁽¹⁾ Schoell, x. 193. llard. xii. 34, 35.
(2) "No sconer was the king's proclamation known, than every man straightway hastened to clap his 'heagt' on his breast; the next day not a single person was to be seen in the streets without the national symbol. Our colours, indeed, are not brilliant—white and black; but the white shall express the purity of our cause—the black our mourning for the fatherland, and our stern determination to avenge it. We shall add red when we return triumplant from the combat; from out of blood and death freedom shall grow,"—Vor B. to Forster, Berlin, 17th March 1813.—Forster, 108.

^{(3) &}quot;Germany is np; the Prussian dagle awakens in all hearts the great hope of German, at least Northern German, freedom. My muse sights for her fatherland; let me be her worthy disciple. Yes, dearest father, I have made up my mind to be a soldier. ·dier; I am ready to cast away the gifts that fortune has showered upon me here, to win myself a fatherland, were it with my blood."—Theodore Kon-Then to his Father. Vienna, 10th March 1813.—
Deutche Pandora, 87.

(4) Ilard. xii. 34, 35, Schoell, x. 193. Cond.

Camp. of 1813-14.

menuoned (1), by which the Prussian cabinet, under the direction of Stein and Scharnhorst, taught wisdom in the salutary school of adversity, though restricted by the treaty of Tilsis to an army of forty-two thousand men, had contrived in reality to have a hundred and twenty thousand on foot, by limiting the period of service which each individual was bound to serve to two or three years, and maintaining a number of volunteers ready to enter the regular army on the first vacancy, who, though not formally enrolled, were already instructed in the rudiments of the military art. The young men thus habits of the clevated classes who thus, without exception, passed through established, calculated to awaken the sentiment of honour in the breast of the soldier, and make lum consider the loss of it as his greatest humiliation. Nor had less care been bestowed upon the material of the army than the composition and extension of its ranks. By nurchases made in Austria, or manufactories of their own recently established, they had succeeded in procuring a hundred and fifty thousand muskets in excellent condition, the field-nieces, which had been almost entirely lost in the disastrous campalen of 1806, had been restored by melting down the bronze cannon in the fortresses, and replacing them by substitutes of iron; eight fortresses, still in the hands of the national troops, had been put in a respectable posture of defence, and a train of field artiflery and caissons, adequate for a hundred and twenty thousand men, was already prepared. Add to this, that the losses of the Prussians in the last campaign had been by no means in the same proportion as those of the French, or of the contingents of the other German states, the snows of Russia had only swallowed up two batteries of horso artillery, which Napolcon had accidentally met in Russia; and forced, contrary to the treaty, to accompany him to Moscow, and D'York's convention had preserved his corps from those disasters which had proved so fatal to the other divisions of the army (2). Thus it was that Prussia, even though reduced to half her former territory and population by the treaty of Tibit, was able to reappear with such distinction on the theatre of Furone and that the previous wisdom and foresight of her government enabled her to turn to such maryellous account the present burst of patriotic enthusiasm among her people.

But while these efforts were made by the Prussan people, in the of thesis and issues found belief that the part of their government was decidedly taken, of Russia. Not that the monarch was Ignorant of the spirit which pervaded his subjects, or felt less keenly than in former years the innumerable injuries and insults he had received from France; but he had a serious diread of violating a subsisting treaty of alliance, for the rupture of which no new cause of adequate magnitude could be assigned; and he was strongly attached to that system of temporizing, which had so long been the ruling policy of Prussia, which is, perhaps, necessarily the resort of the weaker state when exposed to collision with the stronger, and which had only been abandoned, on the eye of the battle of Jena, to precipitate the state into the abyss of misfortune. His views in the beginning of February were still essentially pacific, and were directed to establish Prussia in a state of armed neutrality between France and Russia, on condition that the fortresses on the Oder should be restored to his arms, and that the former power should withdraw its forces behind the Elbe, and the latter behind the Vistula (1). Such a measure would have been highly advantageous to Napoléon, by enabling him to recall to his standards above fifty thousand veteran troops, now blockaded in the fortresses on the Vistula and the Oder, and to recommence the contest in Germany, if an accommodation proved impossible, with many additional chances in his favour. At the same time Hardenberg reiterated to Saint Marsan, the French ambassador, the most solemn assurances, that "the system of the King had undergone no alteration; that no overtures direct or indirect had been made to Rússia; that he awaited with unequalled anxiety a reply from Paris; because, in the present posture of affairs, if the Emperor approved the steps he had taken to secure the neutrality of Silesia, and would give some pecuniary assistance to Prussia, the alliance would be contracted more closely than ever; and that nothing but despair would throw him into the arms of Russia (2). There can be no doubt that these protestations on the part of the Prussian monarch were sincere, and that it only lay with Napoléon, ceived these by giving him some pecuniary assistance, and repaying a portion of the enormous war contributions, amounting to 94,000,000 of francs, (L.5,650,000,) which had been levied on his dominions in the preceding campaign, to secure the cabinet of Berlin in the French alliance, and gain an auxiliary force of sixty thousand men to aid him in defending the course of the Elbe. It was to these points, and, above all, assistance, in money, which, in the exhausted state of Prussia, was an indispensable preliminary to any military efforts, that all the exertions of Frederick William were directed (5). But Napoléon was inexorable. He was firmly convinced that these protestations of fidelity on the part of the Prussian monarch, were mere devices to gain time; that the policy of the court was determined, and even that, if it were not, such was the vehemence of the national feeling, that it would erelong force the cabinet into the Russian alliance. He deemed it; therefore, useless to dissemble any longer, and told General Krusemark, who had been sent from Breslau to conclude the negotiation, that he was not disposed to furnish arms to his enemies; and that he would give Prussia no pecuniary assistance nor relief whatever (4). This refusal, concurring with an active

^{(1) &}quot;The King has conceived the idea that nothing would contribute more powerfully to advance the great work of peace than a truce, in virtue of which the French and Russian armies should mutually retire to a certain distance, and leave the intermediate country undecupied between them. Would the Emcountry unoecupied between them. Would the Emperor Napoléon be disposed to enter into such an arrangement? Would he consent to restore the fortresses on the Oder, and that of Dantzie, to the Prussian troops jointly with the Saxous, and to retire his army behind the Ribe, provided the Emperor Alexander withdrew his beyond the Vistula?"— Handenbeing's Note, 15th February 1813.—Handenbeing, xii. 32. BERG, Xii. 32.

^{. (2)} St. Marsan to Berthier, 15th Feb. 1813. Fam, i. 235, and 239. Hard. xii, 32.

^{(3) &}quot;Tell the Emperor, that, as to pecuniary sacrifices, they are no longer in my power; but that, if he will give me money, I can raise and arm 50,000 or 80,000 men for his service. I am the natural ally of France : by changing my system of pohey, I would only endanger my position, and give the Emperor grounds for treating me as an enemy. I know that there are fonls who regard France as struck down; but you will soon see it present an army of 300,000 men as brilliant as the former. I will support all the sacrifices required of me, to seeure the prosperity and future welfare of my family and people."—Francerick William's words, in Shint-Marsh to Duke or Bassano. 12th January 1813. Fair, i, 213.
(4) "The refusal on the Emperor's part of any

correspondence which at the same period was going on between Hardenberg and kutusoff, after the arrival of the Emperor Alexander at halisch, relative to the neutrality of the Prussian states, on which the king was so any jourly bent, gave great additional weight to the numerous party in his council who Feb 28 1843 were inclined to the Russian albance, and at length, with creat difficulty, they obtained his consent, but only the evening before it was signed, to the Treaty of Kaniscu, the foundation-stone of that grand albanee which so soon after accomplished the overthrow of Manoli on, and deliverance of Curone (1)

By this freaty, an alliance offensive and defensive was established between the Emperor of Russia and the king of Prussia for the prosecution of the war with I rance, and in order to carry it on with vigour, it was supulated that the former should bring a hundred and fifty thousand men into the field, the latter eights thousand, independent of the carrisons of the strong places. Acuther of the contracting powers was to conclude either a peace or a truce without the consent of the other they were jointly to male cilierts to induce the cabinet of Vienna to join their olliance, and to lose no time in treating with England, in order that Prissia

> in the Such

were the public articles of this important treaty, but the secret conditions were still more material to the future interests of the Prussian monarchy By these, the Emperor of Russia engaged never to lay down his orms until Prussia was reconstituted, in all respects, statistical, financial, and geograplaced, as it had stood not only anterior to the war of 1806, but with such odditions (2) especially in the way of uniting the old provinces to Silesia, as should give it more consistence, and render it an effectual bulwark of the Russian emine with the utmost difficulty (3), was well enare that his political existence was themselved a constant to accede to this treaty could be a constant to accede to this treaty could be a constant. I rederick William, who was only brought to accode to this trenty the German war llis first words, after agreeing to the olliance, were-" Henceforth, gentlemen, it is an affair of life and death " Great pains, accordingly, were taken to conceal the treaty from the knowledge of the I reach ambassador, but, not withstanding every effort, its existence soon transpire ! and Alexander having arrived at Bre-lau from Kalisch in the middle of March, the terms of intimacy on which the two monarchs lived could no longer be concealed, and it was justly thought nunceessars to this end le any longer Two days afterwards, accordingly, the conclusion of the trenty was intimated to the French aml assador, Saint-Marsan, at Breslau and on the same day to the minister of foreign affairs at Paris. Shortly be-

It wis a proced he pres until of an heavilson and the price of the proced to carrie in our off which or git as a du th a proced a Corr, which our consends he departure from he to me the Yord of " III he I me processes used in few hillering to processes from the and with head of the first the processes from each price of me and head of the consense from each price of me and head of the consense from the analysis of the consense of the consense from the analysis of the consense of the consen -Street at a to Black 15th Johnson 1813

Fate 1 235 "37

Face 1 226 "97 (a) the Bana belliver left 55 $413 f $40a, 1 723 114 on 1 1971 littled 5 1 52 23 72 5 on the Treaty in State 5 4 52 23 72 to the Banajian State 5 on the Treaty in State 5 on the Banajian State 5 on the Banaj 343

fore a royal edict had appeared, which declared the conduct of March II. Generals D'York and Massenbach entirely free from blame in the convention with the Russian General Diebitch; and these steps were followed, on the 19th of the same month, by one more decisive, which pointed to the formidable national war which was about to be raised against the French in Germany. By this convention, it was stipulated between Russia and Prussia. - "1. That they should forthwith issue a proclamation, to announce that they had no other object but to rescue Germany from the domination of France, and to invite all lesser princes to concur in that great undertaking, under pain of losing their states. 2. To establish a Central Council of Administration, composed of a delegate from each power, in order to govern provisionally the conquered districts, and divide the revenue between Russia, Prussia, and the Regency of Hanover. 5. To organize all the countries between Saxony and Holland, with the exception of the possessions of the Honse of Hanover and the ancient Prussian provinces, into five great sections, each with a civil and military governor at its head. And lastly, to organize in these provinces both an army of the line and a levy en masse.—Four days afterwards the dissolution of the confederation of the Rhine was announced by a proclamation of Prince Kutusoff, one of the last acts of his glorious career; and the Duke of Mecklenburg Schwerin gave the first example of patriotic devotion, by publicly renouncing his connexion with that league, into which he had been one of the last and most unwilling to enter (1).

When acts of hostility so decisive were in progress on both sides, tions between preparing on the other, it is of little moment to recapitulate what were the ostensible grounds of complaint put forth by the respective cabinets. These, as usual in diplomatic manifestoes, did not contain the real grounds of hostility; inconsiderable causes of dissension were put forward to conceal more serious ones, too deeply felt to be mentioned. Prussia, on her part, independently of the innumerable vexations and injuries inflicted on her people since the peace of Tilsit, rested on three recent grounds of complaint:—the refusal by the French government to enter into any accounting for the immense furnishings in kind, amounting to 95,000,000 of francs, made by her provinces during the last campaign, or admit them as articles of charge against the arrears of contributions, or advance any part of the pay due by France for the Prussian contingent;—the refusal on their part, also, to recognise or sanction, in any form, the neutrality of Silesia, for which the King of Prussia had so anxiously contended, and which was established by the convention 24th February 1812;—and the arbitrary assumption of command taken over Bulow's corps, which, without the consent of the king, had been placed under the orders of Marshal Victor. In reply, the French government, without denying that the accounting for which the cabinet of Berlin contended was wellfounded in principle, maintained that the accounts of furnishings, for which they claimed credit, were not accurate nor sufficiently vouched; -that the exemption from the passage of troops, which the convention of 24th February 1812, secured for a part of the Silesian province, could not be construed as importing an entire neutrality;and that the Prussians had little cause to complain of Bulow's corps having been put under Victor's orders, when, during the alliance between the two countries, his corps had previously admitted a passage through its ranks to the Russian troops on their route to the Oder. On these mutual recrimina-

⁽¹⁾ Mart. xii. 564. Schooll, Recueil, iv. 335. Hist. des Trait. x. 195, 196.

correspondence which at the same period was going on between Hardenberg and Kutusoff, after the arrival of the Emperor Alexander at Kalisch, relative to the neutrality of the Prussian states, on which the hine was so anxiously bent, gave great additional weight to the numerous party in his council who Feb 28 1813 Were inclined to the Russian alliance; and at length, with error difficulty, they obtained his consent, but only the evening before it was signed, to the Treary of hausen, the foundation-stone of that grand alliance which so soon after accomplished the overthrow of Napolcon, and deliverance of Furone (1)

By this treaty, an alliance offensive and defensive was established between the Emperor of Russia and the hing of Prussia, for the ----March 2 prosecution of the war with France; and in order to carry it on with vigour, it was stipulated that the former should bring a hundred and fifty thousand men into the field, the latter eighty thousand, independent of the garrisons of the strong places. Aeither of the contracting powers was to conclude either a neace or a truce without the consent of the other; they were mintly to make efforts to induce the cabinet of Vienna to join their it I' alend in or lor il at Price a mean time, privately communicated to England, Anstria, and Sweden Nich were the public atticles of this important treaty; but the secret conditions were still more material to the future interests of the Prussian monarchy. By these, the Emperor of Russia engaged never to lay down his arms trotal Prussia was reconstituted, in all respects, statistical, financial, and geograplucal, as it had stood not only anterior to the war of 1806, but with such additions (2) especially in the way of uniting the old provinces to Silesia, as should give it more consistence, and render it an effectual bulwark of the Russian empire. Prederick William, who was only brought to accede to this treaty with the utmost difficulty (3), was well aware that his political . existence was thenceforth wound up with the success of Russia in the German war. The first words, after agreeing to the alhance, were-"Henceforth, gentlemen, it is an affair of life and ileath." Great pains, accordingly, were taken to conceal the treaty from the knowledge of the French ambassador, but, notwithstanding every effort, its existence soon transpired: and Alexander having arrived at Breslau from Kalisch in the middle of March, the terms of intimacy on which the two monarchs haed could no longer be concealed, and it was justly thought unnecessary to dissemble any longer. Two days afterwards, accordingly, the conclusion of the treaty nas intimated to the French ambassador, Saint-Marsan, at Breslau, and on the same day to the minister of foreign affairs at Paris. Shortly be-tecensiary and to the account of 1 a cla ma for way

-Saur-Music to Marr, 15th Friday 1913 Fata 6 235 237

Fabs. 1, 235 237

(3) St. Sirena to blaret Feb. 13 4812 Fals., 1
233 231 Fao. 1; 251; Bland All 27 23

233 231 Fao. 1; 251; Bland All 27 23

233 241 Fao. 1; 251; Bland All 27 231

(3) we the Target fab Station Step 181; 231 and

(3) The K. up of Francis — sell Vapulum wine

this provide transverter in a proof boyle and Sonory, take must had be his jud trial respectly. I am when that the provide transverter in a proof to the same takes from 10 just 10 necessary. I men were all stars the muster on h h in when you. All of Greene you read at sull the hard of 700. — the Cate, in fore a royal edict had appeared, which declared the conduct of Generals D'York and Massenbach entirely free from blame in the convention with the Russian General Diebitch; and these steps were followed, on the 19th of the same month, by one more decisive, which pointed to the formidable national war which was about to be raised against the French in Germany. By this convention, it was stipulated between Russia and Prussia.-"1. That they should forthwith issue a proclamation, to announce that they had no other object but to resene Germany from the domination of France, and to invite all lesser princes to concur in that great undertaking, under pain of losing their states. 2. To establish a Central Conneil of Administration, composed of a delegate from each power, in order to govern pravisionally the conquered districts, and divide the revenue between Russia, Prussia, and the Regency of Hanover. 5. To organize all the countries between Saxony and Holland, with the exception of the possessions of the Ilauso of Hanover and the ancient Prussian provinces, into five great sections, each with a civil and military governor at its head. And lastly, to organize in these provinces both an army of the line and a levy en masse.-Four days afterwards the dissolution of the confederation of the Rhine was announced by a proclamation of Prince Kutnsoff, one of the last acts of his glorious career; and the Duke of Mecklenburg Schwerin gave the first example of patriotic devotion, by publicly renouncing his connexion with that league, into which he had been one of the last and most unwilling to enter (1).

Progress of When acts of hostility so decisive were in progress on both sides, the negotiations her and injuries so deep had been inflicted on the one hand, and were tween Prussia and Preparing on the other, it is of little moment to recapitulate what were the ostensible grounds of complaint put forth by the respective cabinets. These, as usual in diplomatic manifestoes, did not contain the real grounds of hostility; inconsiderable causes of dissension were put forward to conceal more serious ones, too deeply felt to be mentioned. Prussia, on her part, independently of the innumerable vexations and injuries inflicted on her people since the peace of Tilsit, rested on three recent grounds of complaint:—the refusal by the French government to enter into any accounting for the immense furnishings in kind, amounting to 95,000,000 of francs, made by her provinces during the last campaign, or admit them as articles of charge against the arrears of contributions, or advance any part of the pay due by France for the Prussian contingent;—the refusal on their part, also, to recognise or sanction, in any form, the neutrality of Silesia, for which the King of Prussia had so anxiously contended, and which was established by the convention 21th February 1812;—and the arbitrary assumption of command taken over Bulow's corps, which, without the consent of the king, had been placed under the orders of Marshal Victor. In reply, the French government, without denying that the accounting for which the cabinet of Berlin contended was wellfounded in principle, maintained that the accounts of furnishings, for which they claimed credit, were not accurate nor sufficiently vouched;-that the exemption from the passage of troops, which the convention of 24th February 1812, secured for a part of the Silesian province, could not be construed as importing an entire neutrality;and that the Prussians had little cause to complain of Bulow's corps having been put under Victor's orders, when, during the alliance between the two countries, his corps had previously admitted a passage through its ranks to the Russian troops on their route to the Oder. On these mutual recrimina-

⁽¹⁾ Mart. xii. 564. Schoell, Recueil, iv. 335. Hist. des Trait, x. 195, 196.

70 ICHAR, TXIX tions, it seems sufficient to observe that the Prussian complaints seem well-

founded on the first head, and the French on the two last: for it is clear that the cabinet of Berlin had as good cause for insisting that the enormous requisitions levied on their people should be taken into account in settling the arrears of nas and war contributions, as that of the Tutleries had for representing the passage of the Russians through Rulow's corps as an infringement of the alliance, and the much sought neutrality of Silesia as an inwarranted extension of the article in the former treaty, concerning the passage of troops through that province But it is superfluent to enter into any lengthened detail on the subject, when the estensible grounds of complaint on both sides were so widely different from, and immeasurably inferior to, the real causes of the war. Prussia struck for the deliverance of Germany-Prance for the preservation of her European dominion (1)

Additional Two additional conventions were signed at Kalisch, immediately convent des after the declaration of war, for the further regulation of the vast interests of insurgent Germany, with which the Russian and Prussian monarchs were now charged By the first, Count hotzebue and Baron Stein were appointed members of the administrative council created by the convention of Breslan, on the part of Russia, and Schoen and Rediger on that of Prussia. These functionaries were directed to proceed forthwith to Dresden, and assume the administration of the whole countries Ising on the right bank of the Cibe (2); while, by the second, minute directions were laid down for the provisioning, billeting, and marches of the finssian armies, as long as they should remain in the Prussian territories

Ineffectual attempts to induce Sayouv to join the against

The open adhesion of Prussia to the Russian alliance, and the advance of their united armies in all quarters to the shores of the Elbe, had immediately the effect of rendering the insurrection universal on its right bank; but Saxony was still undecided, and though the ferment was almost as vehement in its provinces as the Prus-

Trance. sian states, yet no symptom of approbation of it had yet been given by the government, and it was well known that the vast benefits the king had received from the French Emperor, had bound him to his interests by very different bonds from those which retained the other states of the Bhenish confederacy in their allegiance. The reputation, however, which the King of Saxony had justly acquired for justice and probity, rendered it of great importance to obtain the moral weight of his adhesion to the Germanic league, and his states lay so immediately in the theatre of war between the contending armies, that it was of the last importance to seeme without delay the support of his forces in the field, and the protection of the strong fortresses which he held on the Elbe. The allied sovereigns, accordingly, from the very first spared no efforts to induce him to join their league; but nothing could shake the firmness of Frederick Augustus, and he declared he would share the fortunes of his benefactor, whatever they might be. While history must remark with admiration the fidelity of this upright monarch to his engagements (1), which seemed to increase with the disasters which had dissolved those of so many other states, it must vet lament the unhappy combination of circumstances which thus put his private honour at variance with his public duty, and rendered it impossible for him to adhere to his engagements without sacrificing the interests of his country.

The advance of the Russian troops towards Dresden in the end of all attempts February, rendered it no longer possible for the King to remain in that capital; and he accordingly ahandoned it on the 21th February, after issuing a proclamation, in which he declared his resolution never to separate his cause from that of his tried benefactor and powerful ally (2). On the 9th April, the King of Prussia addressed a letter to the King of Saxony, in which he expressed "a hope that all the German princes will seize with eagerness an opportunity which certainly will not again present itself, of shaking off the chains of France, by which they are fettered, and which have so long plunged these once flourishing countries in misery and rnin." Frederick Augustus, however, returned for answer, that "he was guided solely by a regard for the good of his dominions, and respect for the engagements which he had contracted;" and thenceforward all negotiations between the parties ceased, and Saxony remained permanently attached to the fortunes of Napoléon (5).

Negotiations Important as these negotiations were, they yet yielded in magniwith Austria. tude and interest to those which at the same period took place between the cabinets of St.-Petersburg, Berlin, and Vienna, with a view to detach Austria from the French alliance; and which, in their ultimate effects, came to exercise a decisive influence upon the issue of the war.

First mea. It may readily be believed that the unparalleled disasters of the Moscow campaign produced as powerful a sensation at Vienna as Austria after the elsewhere in Europe; and that the strong party there, who had al-Moscow ways been hostile to the French alliance, deemed the time at last retreat.

peace are not heard, will await us from the aid of

⁽¹⁾ Schooll, x. 199. Proclamation of King of Saxony, Feb. 23, 1813. Ibid, p. 200.

(2) "Faithful to our alliance, we recl. on with confidence on the success which, if our wishes for near are not beard with which, if our wishes for near are not beard with which with the following success."—Proclamation of Tarbers Austral, Teb. 23, 1813. Schoolly, x. 200. derated princes, and the approved valour of our brave soldiers."-Proclamation of Yanuanica Auausrus, Teb: 23, 1813. Schooll, x. 200.
(3) Schoell, x. 201, 202.

arrived when Austria might regain her lost provinces, and resume her wonted station on the theatre of Europe The earliest letters of M Otto, the French ambassador there, accordingly, after the Moscow catastrophe was known, contained the most vivid pictures of the vehemence of the public feeling, and of the loud declarations that the power of France was irrecoverably broken, that all Germany would speedily rise to assert its independence, and that Austria would deservedly perish, if, at such a crisis, she so far forgot what was due to herself, as the ancient head of the Germanic empire, and her obvious present interests, as to adhere to the withering alliance of the French Emperor So powerful and general was this feeling, that it required all the firmness of M de Mettermeh to withstand the torrent, and he was exposed to no small obloquy by attempting to moderate it (1) But his line of policy from the very first was decidedly taken. Aware that Austria, placed midway between the two, had as much to fear from the colossus of Russia as that of France, his great object was to improve the present juncture in such a way as to make it turn as much as possible to the advantage of his own country, and give her the means of maintaining her independence in the midst of the terrible contest which was approaching, and was likely soon to shake to its foundation every European monarchy. With this view, while he protested, with perfect good faith, that Austria would not take part against the French empire, that she was sincerely devoted to its interests, would not open a negotiation with England without its privity, and would make use of all a ment all ones which are increases Interes her to dietate a general le no secret of his perfect acthe Grand Army had undergone, of the vast league, at the head of which Austria, if so disposed, might now place herself, and of the loud clamour which was now raised by fifty millions of men for her to assume that station (2)

The intelligence which soon after arrived of the defection of peculiarly difficult to be withstood by a power which, from the result of it.

(1) In the r fury against France the wee for-what I say we have a thousand wave of error up at the treth which are not open to you. (a) led an they lengther by all your en men, we eastly e fet from them their most secret through the all and any and the through the same of the sa e fee from them their most secret theograph the off not open any lard communic ten with England willows your author 131 and new lide in in the manner wea, with assuming the air of a govern which are spontaneous !! What here you over which are spectarism to their here is fear? He w transportante the English to a great take area some r and take area served to mer t of not pe n ng a-e ues as a a a they suppose us less ja veriol than the flutalists and when the most futtering offers Half the and when the took lattering other-maily the light to provinces and the su, erms y in 6 ermany are made to indoor them to be a the Pussian lague. Acceptabless he due not necessate aug a signer reverturies for the not necessate one advantages for yet endry more up h as do necessarily to the sign of peated wars, and constant diminutions of territory, found its finances in the most deplorable condition. The intelligence from Prussia, however, and the general ferment which it produced throughout Germany, awakened new alarms in the breast of the eautious and farseeing Austrian minister, lest the Russian influence should be unduly extended during the first transports of German deliverance, and the revolutionary spirit revived in Europe in the course of the last three of the struggle for its extinction (1). He deemed it most prudent, therefore, to make separate overtures to the eabinet of London, with a view to a general pacification; and although this was done with the knowledge and approbation of the French ambassador, yet his proposals were intended to lay the foundation of separate measures; while, in order to give them the appearance of coming secretly from the Austrian cabinet, he sent M. Wessenberg, the agent employed, by the circuitous route of Copenhagen and Gottenburg, as if by stealth to conceal his motions from the knowledge of the French authorities, though at the same time his whole movements and instructions were communicated by the French ambassador at Vienna to Napoléon. Wessenberg was the bearer of a letter to Lord Castlereagh, in which the mediation of Austria was proposed to put a period to the calamities which desolated Europe; a friendly intervention was all that was yet announced, although Austria was underhand arming, and preparing to throw her weight in the field into the seale against any power which might resist her demands. So completely, however, was the double intrigue thus earrying on by the imperial cabinet concealed from those not immediately in the secret, that Wessenberg was arrested by the French authorities at Hamburg, and only allowed to proceed on his destination after his papers had been examined; a slight which gave great umbrage to the court of Vienna, and threw a sensible chill over the friendly nature of the relations between the two eabinets (2).

Austria be. Meanwhile the Emperor of Russia sent a confidential agent, M. Stakelberg, to Vienna, in order to sound the imperial cabinet on the project of an European alliance against France: this proceeding was ostensibly quite secret, while Metternich, without making known their real tenor, ostensibly revealed his whole confidential communications to M. Otto, who daily transmitted accounts of them to Paris (5). The efforts of Metternich, however, in all this maze of diplomatic intrigue, of which alone he kept the thread, and in which he made all parties believe he was confidential with them alone, were uniform and consistent—to increase the weight of Austria in the estimation of all the powers, by representing her mediation as too important to be rejected, and her aid too powerful to be withheld. To improve the great advantages, however, which circumstances had thus put at his disposal, the Austrian minister added seventy thousand

^{(1) &}quot;D'York's defection," said Metternich to M. Otto, "affords an instance of what I have so often directed your attention to, the graca fides of the Russians, and the embarrassing situation in which, in consequence, the greater part of sovereigns are placed, in respect to their troops and their subjects. Metternich appears to me to lahour under the apprehension, that the defection of the Prussian troops may become the signal of a recolution, in consequence of which the Russians will profit with their ordinary astuteness by the first impression which it may create in Poland and Germany."—Court Orto to Maket, 11th Jan. 1813. Fain, i. 296, 297.

⁽²⁾ Otto to Marct, Jan. 21, 1813. Thib. ix. 227,

⁽³⁾ After listening to Stakelberg's enumeration of the great advantages gained by Russia, and its disposition to come to the aid of other powers, especially Austria, and enable it to recover its lost provinces, 'Metternich said—"Listen, my dear Stakelberg; you are tike a man who sees the light for the first time, after baving been slut up six months in a dark room: the radiance of day dazzles you. Believe me, we see more clearly. The system of the Emperor is immovable: it is to think nothing of territorial aggrandizement, which would be too dearly purchased by the expense of a single campaign: he wishes only a general peace, and anxiously desires that you should coneur in it."—, Otto to Market, 26th Jan, 1813. 1 men from the landwehr, or militia, to the regular army; still holding out to the French ambassador, that the object of the armament was to give such weight to the Austrian intervention, as to render Russia unable to interest, which subsisted between the two nowers, and announced his intention of sending Prince Schwartzenberg to Paris still further to improve it. while in secret he was lending a ready car to the overtures of both Bussia and Prussia, and maintaining a correspondence, veiled in profound mysters, with Hardenberg at Breslau (9)

74

. . .

Napoleon, more clear-sighted than his amhassador, was not altoment by gether satisfied with his diplomatic relations at Vienna; and, in med arters particular; entertained a not unnatural realousy of the friendly of Narbonne mediation of a power which, at the moment it professed such cordial feelings of ottachment, was adding seventy thousand men to its troops of the line. This feeling of uneasuress was not diminished by the declaration issued by Austria in the middle of Februars, which announced that her intervention was to be that of an "armed mediation;" and called upon the nation to submit to new burdens to enable the government to maintain that station, and " transport the war from its own frontiers " The omihous nature of this declaration was not materially removed by the resterated assurances of Metternich to the French ambassador, that it was against flussin that all these preparations were directed, and that the most carnest desire of the cabinet of Vienua was to maintain unchanged its amicable relations with France The Emperor began to entertain serious apprehensions that Austria was only dissembling to gain time to complete her preparations; that a good understanding between her and the northern courts was already laving the foundation of a more formidable coalition than I rance had set encountered; and that 31 Otto had been the dupe of the superior finesse and dissimulation of Metternich In order to get to the bottom of the affair, he recalled Otto, and sent Count Narboune to Vienna, to endeavour to penetrate the real intentions of the Austrian cabinet. The polished manners and diplomatic talents of the new ambassador, were well calculated to gain the confidence of the aristocratle erreles at the imperial capital; but he himself had a pre-entiment that the case was hopeless before his arrival, and said, on setting out, > re Four alliance with Paus a," to d Metternich te Otto, " was monstrous; it had no I medet on Lut ! Otto, was monitous it had not ment on that a most precurious has mailed of the victures of the largest countere. It was an electro true or locates and economical for the projectory if a talk not socially be of long darst another, we talk not socially be of long darst another, we

"when the physician pronounces the case hopeless, they send for the quack (1)."

Count Narbonne arrived at Vienna on the 17th March. Schwartzenberg, on the Austrian side, did not leave that capital till the 29th, and was only to present his credentials at the Tuileries on the 15th April, two days before Napoleon set out for the army. Though the new ambassador was received with the most studied attention by the Austrian court, yet circumstances ere long occurred, which demonstrated by deeds, more truthful than words, that there was a secret understanding between the cabinet of Vienna and the allied powers. Intelligence of the treaty of Kalisch between Russia and Prussia was received about the same time; and Metternich, finding that the league was every day becoming more formidable, began to be more independent and resolute in his language; while the magnitude and energy of his military preparations clearly evinced that, incline to what side she might, Austria was resolved to act no subordinate part in the strife. Those preparations, and the continued retreat of the Austrian army in Gallicia, were the result of the secret understanding between the cabinet of Vienna and that of St.-Petersburg, which led in the end of March to an accommodation between their respective forces, of which Napoleon justly complained as highly prejudicial to his interests. By this convention it was stipulated, that the Russian corps should push out light troops on both flanks of the retreating Austrians; that the Russian general should denounce the termination of the armistice to their commander, assigning as a pretext the impossibility of leaving on his own flanks and rear · the flame of insurrection, excited by the Polish army under Prince Poniatowsky; that the Russian corps should then advance with a force at least equal to that of the Austrians, and General Frimont, commanding in the absence of Prince Schwartzenberg, should retire along the right bank of the Vistula: that as soon as this retreat was concluded, a new armistice should be agreed to, without any limit in point of time, to be terminated only on a notice of fifteen days, and during which the Austrians should preserve the towns of Cracow, Sandomir, and the post of Opatowin, with a tête-de-pont in front of each of their respective bridges; and "that the present transaction between the two imperial courts shall remain for ever secret, and shall not be communicated, by the one party or the other, but to the King of Prussia alonc." Shortly after, a convention was concluded between the Austrian and Saxon commanders, which provided for the passage of the Saxon troops, about five thousand in number, which had fallen back to the Gallician frontiers with Schwartzenberg's corps through the imperial territories. The latter convention was immediately and officially laid by Schwartzenberg at Paris before the cabinet of St.-Cloud, while the former was religiously preserved a secret; but along with the document there was presented the ominous declaration-" His Imperial Majesty regards the present moment as that which must decide the fate of Europe, by fixing that of the intermediate powers. Neither France nor Russia run any considerable risk: it is Austria and Prussia which are really endangered. The Emperor of Austria will remain faithful to his character: he will not limit his proceedings in favour of the cause which he feels himself bound to support, that of peace, to mere words; and if the exaggerated ideas which possibly may arise in some of the coalesced cabinets should prevail over the reason and moderation which he himself will never cease to profess, his Imperial Majesty will, without hesitation, cast an imposing force into the balance of the power which he may regard, without respect to the immense complications of the moment, as his most natural ally (1).

⁽¹⁾ Otto to Maret. 20th March 1813. Fain, i. 311. Thib. ix. 235, 236. Hard. vii. 75, 75---

, HISTORY OF EUROPF. [Chap. LXIX.

regard, without respect to the immense complications of the moment, as his most natural ally (1).

Propose Notwithstanding all the pains which were taken to conceal the imbapoles portant convention of halisch from the knowledge of the French diplomatists, its effects were too important to permit it to remain the permit it to remain metallicities and in particular, the continued refrest of the Austrian auxiliary corps under General Frimont, and continuation of the armstice between it and the Russians, appeared the more extraordinary to Napoleon, that it occurred at the very time when he himself was setting out for able a demand, the more especially as Napoléon had previously announced, that in the beginning of May he was to be on the Eibe at the head of three hand in fundred thousand men, and had urged the cabinet of Vienna to second his operations, by debouching from Bohemia at the head of a hundred thousand, and at the same time denouncing the armstice, and resuming lostilities with at least fifty for contented humself.

Amiles ardent lopes, Austria, from her mediatorial attitude, and the geographical situation of her empire, could no longer take part in the war in the quality of a merely auxiliary power; and that, in concequence, the stipulations regarding succour measure of war nor of peace. In the former view, it is not with an army of thirty thousand men that the Imperor should appear in the field; in the latter, it would be highly nobecoming in a mediating power to be the first to revive hostilities. The Emperor is thoroughly persuaded, as his majesty the

to give to its words the necessary support (7)."

While the eabmet of Vienna, veining its preparations under the specious guice of a wish to support with effect the part of a nocinal such to, which was with some plausibility represented as in a manner forced upon 14, was thus gradually but perceptably extricating itself from the proteins of the French alliance, and preparing to appear, at no distant forced upon it, was thus graduaty but perceptury extremity for the the restraints of the French alliance, and preparing to appear, at no distant period, with decisive effect on the theatre of I prope, negotiations of a more conclusive character had taken place with the court of Stockholm, Russia, in the first instance, had taken the lead in these communications; and even so Dec. 29, 1812, far back as the close of 1812, made overtures with a view to obtaining the more active accession of Sweden to the cause of the confederacy, on condition of her obtaining the cession of Norway, which, since the loss of Finland, had become almost indispensable to her existence as an independent nation. The success of this important negotiation was much facilitated by the arrogance with which, at the same period, Napoléon continued to treat Bernadotte in his diplomatic intercourse; an arrogance more suitable to the victor of Wagram than the fugitive from Russia. So keenly did the old French marshal feel this treatment, that not only did he publish a report by his minister Engestroom, setting forth the ruinous consequences to Sweden of the alliance with France; but, in the end of March, he addressed a letter to Napoleon, offering his mediation for the conclusion of a general peace, and containing expressions indicating the indignation felt at the unworthy treatment of two hundred Swedish vessels and their crews, captured by France before war had begun between the two powers, the crews of which were still detained in prison, while their cargoes had been confiscated (1). Views of Denmark to the sacrince of Norway, was accompanious at this period ed to be gained by holding out the prospect of an indemnity on the cabiside of Germany; and on this condition, it was carnestly pressed on the cabinet of Copenhagen to join its forces to those of Russia and Prussia. It was difficult to see where this indemnity was to be found; for the Hanse Towns, which lay nearest to the Danish continental territories, would, on account of their commerce, be taken, it was foreseen, under the protection of Great Britain; Westphalia, carved out of the old provinces of Prussia, was already reclaimed by its sovereign; and Mecklenhurg belonged to a prince united by the ties of blood to the imperial house of Russia. In these circumstances, the negotiation was not likely to lead to any satisfactory issue, though it was prosecuted at Copenhagen with much earnestness by the agents both of the cabinets of St.-Petersburg and St.-James's; and so far did it proceed, that at length Count Moltke and Count Bernstorff were sent to Kalisch, with ample nawers to signify the accession of Denmark to the European alliance, provided the fleet taken at Copenhagen, with all the Danish colonies conquered by the English during the war, were restored; Hamburg and Lubeck made over to them; six hundred thousand pounds paid as an indemnity for their losses during the bombardment of Copenhagen; and all their European possessions, particularly Norway, guaranteed to the Danish crown (2).

Treaty of Orebrowith Sweden, conferences, the more especially as they had a tendency to throw a chill over the negotiations with Sweden, whose forces, under the able direction of Bernadotte, were much more likely to interpose with effect in the approaching conflict in the north of Germany. It was justly determined, therefore, by the British cabinet, that they were altogether inadmissible; and, without attempting the hopeless task of appearing the resentment, or satisfying the demands of the Danish government, diplomatic relations were sire: but where is your army? The dite of France, Italy, and Gremany no longer exist. There lie without sepulture the remains of those brave men who saved France at Fienens, who conquered in Italy, survived the burning climate of Egypt, and chained victory to the Imperial standards at Marengo, Austerlitz, Jena, and Friedland,"—See the Letter in Scaoen,'s Reeneil, i. 28.

⁽¹⁾ Hard, xii, 45, 46. Schooll, Recueil, i. 28. In that letter Bernadotte added, relative to the Moscow campaign: "From the moment that your majesty plunged into the interior of that empire, the issue could not be doubtful; the Emperor Alexander and King of Sweden foresaw, in the end of Angust, its immense results; all the military combinations announced that your majesty would be made prisoner. You have escaped that danger,

(2) Hard, xii. 97, 98.

more closely drawn with the court of Stockholm. They terminated in a treaty, by which the accession of Sneden to the Grand Alliance was openly secured. By it Swoden engaged to employ an auxiliary corps of thirty thousand ment to be placed, with the forces of Russia, in the north of Germany, under the command of the Prince Royal of Sweden; while England promised to eede Guadaloupe to Sweden, and grant her a subsidy of a million a year, payable monthly; and received in return a promise, that for twenty years the British merchants should enjoy the right of an entrepot in the harbours of Cottenberg; Carlsham, and Stralsund. The cession of Norway to Sweden was not openly recognised in this treaty; but it was indirectly sanctioned by a clause, in which, on the narrative that the cristing engagements between Bussia and Sweden had been communicated to the British government, provided that England "not only should oppose no obstacle to the perpetual annexation of Norway to Sweden, but should facilitate in that respect the views of the

to join the alliance, on terms consistent with the existing cogagements between the courts of St.-Petersburg and Stockholm, and that in the proposed junction every possible regard should be paid to the happiness and liberty of the record of Norway (1)."

After this overt act of hostility, or rather of pacific spohation, had the mass of the state of the expected that Denmark was the powers arrayed a relations with the horthern powers, and promised to farmish thenty-five thousand men to ald their armies, while at the same time it was secretly negotiating with the French the means of delivering to them Hamburg. But Russia could not promise them any adequate compensation for the loss of Norway; and although Sweden offered to relinquish all clams on that langdom, provided she were secured in the bishopic of Drountein, yet the Danish this train ners, and enemies.

the train ners, and tween the after powers errition of his post at the

(1) See the Treaty in Martin's Sop. v. 232, and Fam, i. 233, and in Ann. Reg. 1812. State Papers,

p. 459.

p. v. 23t. and [1] Mard 265. 27, 181 School, 2 201, 201 Feel. State Capens, Bells. head of the army on the Oder, in January, had sufficiently evinced his disposition, if he could find an opportunity, of making his peace with the Allies, lent a willing car to the insinuations of the cabinet of Vienna-"that now was the time, by declaring himself openly, to secure his throne on a solid foundation; but, desirous of saving that of Napoléon, he wrote early in April to the Emperor, urging him in the name of humanity, and from a due regard to his own safety and glory, to put a period to a war, disastrous at once to France and Europe, and particularly ruinous to Naples, where the Carbonari, instigated by the English, were perpetually on the verge of revolt." Neither this letter, nor others which he wrote at the same period to Marie-Louise, met with any answer; but Murat, still uncertain of the line which the cabinet of Vienna were to adopt, and desirous of seeing the issue of the approaching campaign, before he took a decided part, deemed it prudent in the mean time to adhere to the French alliance, though the seeds of distrust were irrevocably sown between him and his imperial brother-inlaw (1).

While Europe, shaken to its centre by the dreadful catastrophe Energetic of the Moscow campaign, was thus breaking up into new alliances, and separate interests were beginning to alienate from each other the members of the great war confederacy, which had sprung from the military triumphs of the French Revolution, Prussia, which, placed in the front of the battle, had both drawn the sword and thrown away the scabbard, was straining every nerve to augment her military force. Already a proclamation from Prince Kutusoff had announced the dissolution of the confederaey of the Rhine, and called upon all the members of it to join in the great league formed for the deliverance of Germany (2). To increase the general fervour, Frederick William at the same time instituted a new order, ealled that of the Iron Cross, to reward his subjects for the sacrifices which they were called on to make in behalf of their country; and invited all classes to pour their gold and silver ornaments into the public treasury, where they would receive iron ones, fashioned in the same form, to preserve in their families—a monument at once of past wealth and succceding patriotism: and shortly afterwards a proclamation was issued to the former subjects of Prussia, who had been wrested from her by the treaty of Tilsit, inviting them to take up arms for the independence of Germany; and that proclamation, secretly circulated by the members of the Tugendbund, was received with avidity, and read with transport. The Emperor Alexander and the King of Prussia immediately appeared in public, decorated with the new order, which was placed on the breast of the former beside the medal of 1812. The scholars of the universities, the professors, the burghers, alike took up arms; the cares of interest, the pursuits of science, the labours of education, were forgotten. Art was turned only to warlike preparation; genius to fanning the universal ardour: industry to forging the implements of destruction. Körner gave vent to the general enthusiasm in strains of immortal verse, which were repeated by thousands and tens of thousands as they joyously marched to the points of rendezvous; while the women universally scut their precious ornaments to the public treasury, and received in return similar bijoux, beautifully worked in bronze, which soon

⁽¹⁾ Hard. All 78, 83.
(2) "The motto of Alexander and Frederick is,
'Blonour and our country.' Every German worthy of the name should unite with us, and second with his blood, and his whole worldly goods, the efforts making for the liberation of Germany. Every one who shall prove himself a traitor to the cause of the fatherland, deserves to be annihilated by the force of public opinion, and the power of the arms taken up in its holy cause."-Processiantion, 19th March 1813, Habd. xii, 41, 42...

decorated their bosoms, hearing the simple inscription,-"I gave gold for iron, 1815." In a short time none but old men and boys were to be met in the streets: not an ornament, but those of iron, were to be seen either in dress or in the shops. Thence has arisen the famous order of the Iron Cross in . ·Prussia, and the beautiful Berlin bronze ornaments. so well-known and highly prized in every country of Europe. It must be confessed that chinalry cannot boast of a nobler fountain of honour, nor fashion of a more touchure memorial of varine (1).

As long as the French troops maintained their footing on the left tion on the bank of the Elbe, the general fermentation there was limited to a sort of passive resistance, which nevertheless proved extremely embarrassing to the French authorit - Tt arms, or resist their present sovere avoid their exactions. The neasants tion and not a few upon whom the devious ways, crossed the Elhe, and .

When the Allies, however, had passed that river, and the continued advance of the Russians inspired general confidence in the firmuess and constancy of the Emperor Alexander, these feelings rould no longer be suppressed. Insurrections ensued in many places, particularly Bremen, and various parts of Westphalia; and the light bodies of Russian horse who traversed the sandy nlains of Northern Germany were swelled by crouds of volunteers, who followed their standards, and greatly augmented the Prussian ranks. At the same time, the officers of the states in the Rhenish confederacy, who had been made prisoners in the Moscow campaign, with the consent of the government of St. -Petersburg, formed themselves into a legion; declared traifor to his country every German who should bear arms against his brethren; and bound themselves by a solemu oath to combat Napoleon, even unto death. The Turendbund death, The Tugendbund . tions of which were so exte > and Insoured d have found in its impassioned bands the ready elements of revolutionary elevation; but that of thout hand the stream of position and it sent · flood against the encines of the state (2).

(3) Hard xi 42 43. Pisarro's letter to Moderd, Nov 12, 1513 Hild xii, App A. with 16 impost the said an eye witness, whot ill all strong ton helical into the ardener wall which from the leasity of their workmanning, which are ceeds that of any other people. Here from oran-ments cannot as yet be parchased they greetest ind only in exchange for gold. The streets are filled with mothing but women, old men, and shiff ent no de manuanded man, capable of hearing area, to to be seen a harrin land of sand, socred w h poner, exhibits the automating spectaria of porters recy la area, -Pitterto's Tarras, 12 & Tarester

1313 Hann Ell $65, 507. [2] Hard, all $2, 57, beloeff, a $51, $55 one statemen, but without reases, approbract. serious altimate canger from the an preventhis time serious attantic diagor from the superior blo sus-plices of the purpose entire size had form spike in decrease that is would not a be abouted and turned has the right chainst another to mainly distributed to the superior of the about the to-tantic size of temperor in the about the to-lation of temperor in the about the super-lation of temperor in the about the about the start of the about the about the about the start of the melance is also as a first size August 1917 Juni 1913. Death & Andrea. of the Landwehr and Landsturm, in

The wisdom and foresight of the Prussian government turned to Formation the very best account this astonishing outburst of national enthusiasm. It was not suffered to evaporate, as in Spain, in detached efforts, or ill-directed expeditions; undisciplined courage was not, as there, brought up to be slaughtered by experienced prowess; ages of corruption had not paralyzed years of enthusiasm. Previous preparation, prophetic wisdom, had prepared the fit channels for the national fervour. In addition to the great augmentation made to the regular army by the decrees of the 9th and 12th February, already mentioned (1), still more decisive measures were taken, as soon as the alliance with Russia was resolved on, todraw forth the whole military power of the state. By a royal decree of the 14th and 19th March, the LANDWEIR and LANDSTURM were every where called out; the former being a sort of militia, which was for the time put on perx2th and x9th. manent duty, and soon became nearly equal to the regular soldiers; the latter, a levy en masse of the whole male population capable of bearing arms. The former speedily produced a hundred and twenty thousand men. who did good service, not only in recruiting the ranks of the regular army, butby relieving them of the duty of blockading fortresses, watching prisoners, and guarding convoys, which otherwise might have occasioned a serious diminution in the forces which they could bring into the field against the enemy. This body was, in a peculiar manner, serviceable to Prussia, in consequence of the number of her important fortresses which still remained in the hands of the French. By its means, with the aid of a comparatively small body of Russians, a hundred thousand Prussian landwehr kept seventy thousand French veterans blockaded and useless in the fortresses on the Vistula and the Oder. An animated proclamation by the King, on the 19th March, roused to the highest degree the military spirit of his people. "Victory," said Frederick William, "comes from God. Show yourselves worthy of His protection, by your discipline and the exemplary discharge of your duties. Let conrage, patience, fidelity, and discipline ever distinguish you. Imitate the example of your ancestors; show yourselves worthy of them, and think of your posterity. Rewards are secured for those who distinguish themselves; shame and punishment await him who neglects his duty. Your king will never quit you; the princes of his house will be with him, and combat in the midst of your ranks: the whole nation will join in your efforts. We have for an ally a brave people, who have achieved their independence by their valour, and have now come to give it to you. They had confidence in their sovereignin his just eause, in his power-and God gave them victory. Imitate them; for we also combat for liberty and our country. Trust in God-courage and patriotism are inscribed on our banners (2)."

Encouraged by so many concurrent circumstances, which facili-Positions of tated their progress and promised them support, the Russian and Prussian generals soon deemed it safe to cross the Elbe. The posicrossed it. tions which the French army occupied along the course of that river, from Dresden to Hamburg, were as follow :- Davoust, with the 41th eorps, occupied Dessau, and the adjoining banks of the Elbe from thence to Torgau; Victor, with the 2d corps, lay between the Elbe and the Saale; Grenier, with his as yet untouched Italians, was a little in the rear at Halle; while Regnier, with the remains of the Saxons and Durutte's division, occupied the important post of Dresden, and stretched to the foot of the Bohemian mountains; the extreme left wing, under Vandamme, with its headquarters at Brc-men, still occupied Hamburg and the mouth of the Elbe. The earliest reinforcements from France, under Lauriston, drann from the first ban of the National Guards, twenty-four thousand strong, arrived at Magdeburg in the laurist part of March, and raised the centre of the arm, grouped around that fortress, to nearly fifty thousand combatants; while twenty thousand were in the neighbourhood of Dresden, and fifteen thousand on the Lower Elbe. In addition to these imposing forces, key aud Marmont each commanded a corps of reserve, which was forming on the Rhine (1), and Bertrand's corps was in tharch from Italy by the route of the Tyrol, its leading columns having already reached Augsburg in the Bavarian plants.

⁽¹⁾ Ante, ix. 56.

Disposition and audient Forces, important from their numerical amount, though far and number forces, in the fortress in the fortress in the fortress belonged to France, in the fortresses on the visitual and the Oder.

Their number in all was hittle short of seventy thousand a five-audient fluousand were shitted by in Bantzica clane; and those in Thorn, Modin Times and Grandeutz. on the Visitals; and in Spandau, Sietun, contects.

the seeds of contagion and mortality, more terrible than the sword of the enemy. The garrison of Dantzie, composed of the wreek of above a hundred regiments, of two-and-twenty different nations, was in such a state of moral and physical debutty, that, notwithstanding its imposing numerical amount, it could not perform any multiry operation without its walls, and all the other garrisons were in a similar condition. Typhus fever, the well-known and invariable attendant on human suffering, soon began to make frightful ravages in the ranks; and such was the fatigue of the soldiers, that though

o repose, the allied ced them

migtants into the only

and bay onet was required on the banks of the Line 2.7.

In Sections in English in Silesia, twenty-fire thousand Prassan regular troops, comprising the results in Silesia, twenty-fire thousand Prassan regular troops, comprising the results in Silesia, twenty-fire thousand Prassan regular troops, comprising in the troops of the silesia in the company of the silesia in the silesia field. In addition to this, there were thirty-five thousand men in such a state of forwardness in the rear, as to be able to blockade the fortresses on the Oder, still in the hands of the enemy, or to act as a reserve to the armies in the field; and this body was constantly receiving accessions of force from the new levies, both of the line and the landweller, which were in progress in every part of the kingdom (1); so that, when hostilities commenced in the beginning of May, Prussia would bring an accession of at least eighty thousand well disciplined troops to the Russian standard, and this force, if the campaign lasted a few months longer, might be expected to be raised to a hundred and fifty thousand.

The Russian armies at this period, from the effect of the great position of levies and unbounded enthusiasm of 1812, were much more continued has siderable; but the battles and hardships of its dreadful campaign had thinned the ranks of the veteran soldiers, and the new levies, how extensive soever, were in great part drawn from provinces so remote, that they could not be expected to make their appearance on the theatre of war till a very late period of the campaign. At the advanced posts in Germany, therefore, where the contest was to commence, their forces were by no means great; and, such as they were, scattered over an immense extent of country. Count Wittgenstein himself was at the head of thirty-six thousand men, between Berlin and Magdeburg, while thirty-three thousand more, under the command of Tettenborn, Czhernicheff, Woronzoff, and Milaradowitch, were scattered in detached parties along the course of the Elbe, from the neighbourhood of Dresden to the environs of Magdeburg. Twenty thousand more, under Barclay de Tolly, were engaged in the blockade of Dantzic, Zamosc, and Thorn, on the Vistula; and a great reserve, seventy thousand strong, was forming in Poland, under the orders of Sacken; but they were still far distant, and could not possibly reach the banks of the Elbe before the end of July. Thus, seventy thousand Russians were the very utmost that could be relied on for immediate operations in Saxony; and if to them we add fifty thousand Prussians, the whole allied force might he one hundred and twenty thousand strong (2); but as thirty thousand would be required to blockade the imnortant fortresses of Magdeburg, Wittenburg, Torgan, and Koenigstein, on the Elbe, it was doubtful whether more than ninety thousand could be relied on for offensive operations on the Saxon plains.

occupation of Hamburg by struck in the neighbourhood of Hamburg. The fermentation in the Allies that important mercantile emporium had been very great during the whole Russian retreat; and it was only by extraordinary rigour and vigilance that General Cara St.-Cyr, who commanded the French garrison, three thousand strong, had been able to maintain his authority amidst a hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, all but insurgent, by whom he was surrounded. After Wittgenstein, however, had established himself in Berlin, Tettenborn, an active and indefatigable partizan, was detached towards the lower Elbe with three thousand foot and three thousand Cossacks; and at his approach, March 11. General Morand, who was stationed at Neustadt, retired towards Hamburg, which latter town was evacuated by the whole French forces on the day following. On the 18th, Tettenborn, at the head of the advanced guard of his indefatigable Cossacks, approached the town amidst the acclamations and astonishment of a countless multitude of spec-

⁽¹⁾ Schoell, Recueil, ii. 290, 291; and Hist. x. (2) Precis de la Guerre, 1813. Schoell Rec. ii. 209. Jom. iv. 263. 290, 291; and Hist. x. 210, 211. Jom. iv. 263.

its place as

Advance of the Allies to the Libe

were thus gliding away from the grasp of Aspoleon-both parties. having to a certain degree concentrated their forces, were preparing to strike redoubtable blows on the plains of Saxony. In the end of March, Wittgenstein broke un from Berlin and moved towards the Elbe in two columns, one, under himself in person, directing its steps towards Wittenberg-the other, under Bulow, advancing towards Dessau; at the same time Borstel, with fifteen thousand Prussians, formed the blockade of Magdeburg; and Blucher and Winzingerode, with the army of Silesia, twenty-five thousand strong, and ten thousand Russians, advanced towards Dresden from the side of Breslan, The hing of Saxony, in no condition to withstand forces so considerable, entered into a convention for the exacuation of his capital; and Da-" - - - - from I lon une sin' to the great youst, who c grici of the i retired with

Allies entered with drums beating and colours flying, amidst the entitusiasue acclamations of an immense eroud of spectators; for though the court of Dresden remained faithful to its engagements with Napolion, the Saxon people, who had suffered immensely from the long-continued pre-" .- " merd almost manimously ranged on s in Germany for the de-

Wittgenstein's auproach to the Line was preceded by numerous Wingen proclamations, in which he called on the Saxons to join the great effort now making for the freedom of Germany. The tone of these popular addresses is well northy of attention; they show how completely the principles of the contest had changed sides, how thoroughly military despo-

(1) Lond p 8, and top No. 1 Ann Beg 1813, $19 \set, et Conq xxil 22 23. (2) The military stores fauded from Starch 19th to Blay 18th, 1813, ju farthern f ermany, were se

	Horn sh ris						59,000
21$	faulers			٠		٠
121 113	Sett of accontrements		٠	•
34 113	Enchescy a tomfette		٠				#3 127
	taps and frathers .			٠		٠	100 000
				٠			61,521
115 000	Pagnet of procure	•	•				671,690
111703	Do Officel and bote
	121 117 31 113 150 0M	218 failers	218 failers	218 (silers	218 fasters	248 fasters	218 failers 121 142 Serie of accountements 34 143 Kampacela completa Lapa and feathers 150 000 Part of stockles 155 000 Part of stockles

-See Official Statement in Passex Responsants a Report 27 & Sept. 1513, in Insposentant's Cermuny Appe da, to 1 P 3,5 by Angestas II It is $30 feet long wes log on rentren Lutterure anl a etern arches wil an I on Literarde and I read I at perceived when Tenna acces on the L receive a Denale on 1912 p. 89 $1 ()smears, h $8 $1

p. 29 Bt showner, in 10 St.
(4) h. c. of the paid 75 third beauti 20 St.
Tonic perplier 25 de n. (421 de n. d.)
On the 75 is their a hatem to us on, which is neveradored in their not and for which of it is Long for some and at 107 h. d. beca set ref. un drump be go deci un florez bet re-ced utibe & agolifen a de menglet re Co nel utibe & agolifen a de menglet re Co ne ton 2 hold of the Katelfee a to not removed to pe me Prest on 1111 per so Y mes me e v 113

tism had engrafted itself on democratic ambition, and that the French Revolution was henceforward to be combated, in a great measure, with its own weapons (1). They produced an extraordinary impression in the Saxon provinces. In proportion as the French troops evacuated the villages, they instantly rose and joined the invaders; every where the Tugendbund had in secret paved the way for their reception: and almost before the banners of Napoleon were out of sight, the landwehr and the landsturm were organized. and a fearful patriotic warfare was springing out of the sufferings and indignation of the people. If the French columns remeasured their steps, or the chances of war again threw the insurgent villages into the hands of the enemy, the inhabitants fled at their approach; the flour and grain were destroved; barrels of every sort of liquor pierced and run out; the mills and boats burned and scuttled; and the proclamations of the allied sovereigns met with as ready obedience in the territories of the princes of the Rhenish confederacy as in their own dominions (2).

Previous to finally withdrawing across the Elbe, Eugène, in order Mockern, and retreat to oblige the enemy to concentrate his forces, that he might thus obtain an accurate idea of their amount, took post at Moekern, a of Engene little in front of Magdeburg, and there stood firm. Wittgenstein aecordingly collected his troops, and, on the 4th April, attacked the French with great vigour between Mockern and Leitzkau. It was rather an affair of advanced posts than a regular battle; for no sooner were the French tirailleurs, who as usual behaved with the greatest gallantry, driven in, than the main body of their army began to retire. In this movement, however, they felt severely the superiority of the allied horse; two French regiments of lancers, who strove to protect the retreat, were thrown into confusion, and for the most part made prisoners; and it was only by the fortunate occurrence of nightfall that a total rout was prevented, and the troops sueceeded in making good their way to Magdeburg. Next day Wittgenstein continued the pursuit, and leaving Bulow's corps to blockade that fortress, and Kleist with his Prussians before Wittenburg, took post himself at Dessau. Meanwhile Winzingerode, having merely passed through Dresden, pushed on to Halle, which he occupied in strength; upon which Eugène, to preserve his communications with Frankfort and the great road to the Rhine, concentrated his troops on the Upper Saale, leaving only a portion of his army at Magdeburg. The conduct of General Thielman, who commanded the Saxon garrison of Torgau, was at this period the subject of great anxiety. Distracted between duty to his sovereign and to his country, he did not openly join the Allies, but refused to admit Regnier with a French garrison, sent to replace him, and waited behind his formidable ramparts for the instruction of ulterior events. But, though the line of the Elbe was broken through at its two extremities, at Dresden and Hamburg, and doubt existed as to the fidelity of the Saxon garrisons, Eugène boldly maintained his ground

(2) Fain, 1. 107, 108. Schooll, Recueil, i. 352, 357.

^{(1) &}quot;Germans," said he, "we open to you the Prussian ranks; you will there find the son of the Inbourer placed heside the son of the prince; all distinction of rank is effaced in these great ideas—the king, liberty, honour, country! Amongst us there is no distinction but that of talent, and of the ardour with which we fly to combat for the common cause. Liberty or death! These are the rallying words of the soldiers of Frederick William. Saxons! Germansi From the great era of 1812, our genealo-gical trees will count for nothing; the exploits of our ancestors are effaced by the degradation of their descendants. The regeneration of Germany can alone produce new noble families, and restore their lustre to those which before were illustrious. He who is not for liberty is against it; choose between our fraternal embrace and the point of our victorious swords. Risc, Saxons! Free your king from his fetters; exterminate the stranger from the land; and may you soon have a free king, and may he reign over a free people! "—Wittoenstein to the Saxoas, 23d and 30th March 1813 Schoell, files to we it from the

and the powerful reinforcements which he was bringing up from the lithine. In effect, Napoleon, who in his address to the legislative body on the 23d March, had announced his speedy departure for the army, had recently completed all the arrangements requisite before setting out for the theatre of war. Name 200 Letters patent were addressed to the Empress, conferring on her the office and dignity of flegent, with the seat of president of the council of state, and the power of pardon consequent on that exalted station; but without the right of sanctioning any decree of the senate, or proclaiming any law. On the same day, she was invested with the elevated office with great pomp, and received the homage of the principal dignitaries of the empire. It was Napoleon's intention to have set out immediately after this imposing ceremony; but the importance of the negotiation with Austria, and the incomplete state of the preparations on the R

Empress and king of Rome, and set out tot the name, married thus explained his views of the approaching campaign to the Austrian ambassador. Prince Schwartzenberg,—"I set out, and I will send orders to internación de la transferio de la final de la fin La final de la La final de la Europe (2)."

Arrival et Napoleon arrived at Mayence at midnight on the 16th, and reharoton at Mayence, and presed press.

to all the subordinate authorities by whom he was surrounctu. 400 Joint during the values of the fortress were repaired with extraordinary vigour during the whole of April, and cronds of labourers from the whole neighbourhood collected for that purpose: those from the left bank of the Mine received pays.

speciable posture of defence, sat the same time going on to collect and forward troops to reinforce the unity. The accounts from Thuringia and the banks of the Saale were daily becoming more alarming: the Libb had been crossed at many points; the enemy's light troops were advancing in all directions; Leiptic and Nutremburg were in their hands; Franki histel was incurated; terror, the foretuning of disaster, had already brought in imagination the Russians down to the Ribbin. Nor was the political control of the property of the proper to restore

Silesia to the imperial crowir, nau stement, they could consent to no aggrandizement at the expense of Prussia; while the king of

⁽¹⁾ Falm, L. 122, 123, School, Hut. 2, 211, Vact. (2 Falm, L. 123, 117, and 211 Falces Fact Thine of Goog avil. 21, 25.

Saxony, distracted between a conseientious regard to his engagements, and the daily increasing enthusiasm of his subjects and troops to the allied cause, had recently repaired to Prague, where there was every reason to apprehend that his policy would be determined by that of the cabinet of Vienna (1).

In these critical circumstances, when every day and hour was not augment his only of importance to withstand the allied forces actually in the field, but to prevent the accession of new and still more formidable powers to their league, the energy of Napoléon seemed to rise with the difficulties against which he had to contend, and to acquire an almost supernatural degree of vigour. In every direction officers were dispatched to hasten the march, and collect the still unformed bodies of the conscripts, who, before they were well able to handle their muskets, were hurried off to the Rhine; while the Emperor, seated on the bridge of Mayence, seemed to count the numbers of even the smallest bodies of men who were passed over, and endeavoured to inspire the young novices in arms with a portion of his own ardent and unconquerable spirit. But this searching inspection demonstrated how much was yet to be done to restore the efficiency of the French military establishment, and told but too clearly that the Grand Army had irrevocably sunk amidst the disasters of Russia. Notwithstanding the most strenuous efforts to augment that important branch of the service, the number of cavalry which crossed by the bridge of Mayence had not yet exceeded four thousand; and when it was recollected how completely the ranks of horse had been swept away during the Moscow campaign, and how powerful the Allies were in that arm, this circumstance afforded a melaneholy presage as to the issue of the contest which was impending. Nor was the condition of the greater part of the infantry and artillery more encouraging. Though strong in numbers, and animated with courage, they were weak in all the other. qualities which constitute the strength of an army. The youths who had been torn from their homes to recruit the armies, hurried forward to the frontier by forced marches which surpassed their strength, and emaciated by scanty and unwholesome food which they had received on the way, presented in great part the most miserable aspect; and before they ever saw the enemy, their ranks exhibited nearly as woful an appearance as those of the veterans who had survived the horrors of the Moscow eampaign. The "uniformity of ills," so well known in armies, and of such sinister presage when not surmounted by extraordinary mental vigour, or a sudden tide of success, was already visible; and though the patriotic ardour of the young conscripts carried them in a surprising manner through their difficulties, and they evinced extraordinary enthusiasm when passing the Emperor, yet it was but too evident that they were unequal to the fatigues of the approaching campaign; and that, though they might possibly prove victorious in regular battles, they would melt away under the effects of dripping bivouacs, or the horrors of military hospitals (2).

The condition of the cavalry and artillery, with the exception of that of the guard, was still more deplorable. The unfortunate quaartillery. drupeds which were harnessed to the guns, or placed beneath the unskilled riders who had been pressed into the ranks, felt none of the enthusiasm which supported the human conscripts; and the accumulated evils of forced marches, bad provender, and cold beds on the ground, fell upon them with unmitigated severity. So strongly had the evils of a long line of detach-

Country of the Cuard 21 Corps, Victor 31 Corps Vey 4 h Corps Restrand

I & Corne Lawre to-

Carr free?

that they now went into the other extreme les, and columns close to spread the columns very ratifery, staff, and the most frightful confures, "Close up, close up."

sand againsten in the rinks. Such enormous assoon consumed the whole provilabitants on the road side pilage e adjoining districts with the sucdity collected together without adequate previous preparations, sunctions and a smuch before arriving on the Elbe, as they had done in the preceding campaign from the march through Lithuani (1) received happle on left layence on the 24th, and arrived at Friurth the series of an at this per succeeding day. The army, which by extraordinary efforts he had thereof there is another uthout any adequate cavalry or artillery, valry, and their total amount was little ices to a commen (2). This was the force, however, upon which the Emperor had to ...

(-)	,	,
(1) Odel 1 18 24 Fa n # 325 22#		Bron, le forward		27 (0
Ant an a s - a	6th Corps Marmont		•	73 000
(2) All ed and F each Forces at the of	en ng of			21 000
the Campa ga on ha Elle		#1th Corps Nacional !		13 000
1 All ed Troops at the Battle of Lutre		12 h Corps Oud not		23 000
		est Corps of Caralry Lateur-		10.000
Russtans		24 Corps of Carelry S bast an	i r	6.310
Corps of Lieutenshi General Borg Corps of Lieutenshi General Winsings	7 450	1st Corps Danount detached		10 000
role	10 525	Grand to	otal	203 610
Corps of reserve of General Tormassoff	17 350			210
Art Bery sent to the all of Blacker	450
		-traine and a Thbesians
Tqtal	23 175	Total All of Forces in Cornery Canpa 20	og of the Permas
Corps of Blucket	23 550	3131323 5217(414 ¢Q;
Corps of Ceneral Lark	20 000		Mm	Hater
Detached corps of Stal riest	2 199	Deta harest of Tettenborn	$ 379	1 6"3
		Betachment of Borenberg		101
Total	21 150	Detachment of Cabernichell	1.985	92
Total Russians	35 775	Corps of Worons w	5 130
7.44. 1.4744		Bete hinest of Harpe	2 200
Grand total All es	74 975	Deta hment of Roth,	3 100
-Pares vol 1 App $14	-	Corps of M laradawi h	1: 533
		Free Corps	3 000
II French Troops at the Ra the of Lutter		-
Infantry of the Coant	10 000	Total	30 631	4 132
Carelry of the Guard	5 600	ALMIERS Lots bosest 93		11
3 Corps of Marshal Ney	10 000			T 454
4 Corps of Leneral Lerizand	*0.000	Corps of Licutement Ceneral Fer		19 222
6 Corps of Marshal Maramont	25 000	La profilmimant Crossillion		17.214
11 Corps of Nambal Medocal I	15,000	Reserve under I eneral Torinis		112
•		Lat ery sent to the on stance of	1 Inches
Creed betal	EE2 404	Tel	al	15,775
-Scenetz, Tren i de l'arz tel any 213
Total Irm & Forces in Cornery at the spec-	as of the	# $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $ $	>>  	1904
Caupa ga	• • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • • •			13 450
lafantry of the Catel	10.000	Corps of Eartley do Tolly		2 tud
raffatta ma tea a mit.pt	10 640	Company vario

F7 439

Last latte before t at 4

rely for the whole campaign, and in every part of Germany. A considerable portion of it, though all collected in the depots in the interior, had not yet reached the theatre of action; and three corps were swallowed up in the garrisons of Dantzic, and on the Oder, and on the Lower Weser or Elbe. The corns, however, which were under his immediate command, or so near as to be available even at the outset of the campaign-viz. those of Ney at Weimar, of Marmont at Gotha, of Bertrand at Saalefield, and of Oudinot at Coburg, with the guards and reserve eavalry—amounted to a hundred and forty thousand effective men, independent of forty thousand under Prince Engène, which were still in the neighbourhood of Magdeburg. The strength of this immense host, however, consisted in its infantry; it had only three hundred and fifty pieces of eannon, though that number was doubled before the close of the campaign, and could only muster six thousand horse—a poor set-off to nearly thirty thousand superb eavalry, which glittered in the ranks of the enemy (1). Inferiority of the Allies Allies brought into the field in the at the open-latter part of the contest, when Austria had joined the alliance, were much more considerable, and, even in its opening stages, more powerful in eavalry and veteran troops, yet at this period they were * decidedly inferior in numbers to their opponents. So distant were the resources of the Russian, so incomplete as yet the preparation of the Prussian monarchy, that, at the opening of the campaign, they could only collect a hundred and ten thousand regular troops, of which forty thousand were absorbed in blockading the fortresses on the Elbe and the Oder; leaving not quite seventy thousand to meet the shock of battle in the plains of Leipsie (2). In these circumstances, it appeared to many a hazardous and imprindent step to cross the Elbe, of which the whole fortresses were still in the hands of the

Summary.	Russians and Prussians at the Battle of Bautzen
Russians detached on the Elbe, 30,657 Russians who fought at Lutzen, 35,775	nussians.
Russians between the Elbe and the Vistula, 92,750 Russians—Grand Total, . 159,182 —Plotno, vol. i., App. 99.	The Third Army of the West under General Darelay de Tolly,
PRUSSIANS.	The corps de Intaille of Prince Gorchakoff,
Blucher's Corps,	The Reserve of the Grand Duke Constan-
Reserve under Stutterheim, 3,700	tine,
In the field, 28,000	neral Kleist, 2,950
Blockading the fortresses, about, 37.000	Detached Corps, , , 9,300
Total—Prussians, 65,000	Total, 68,000
Do —Russians, 159,182	PAUSSIANS.
-PLOTHO, vol. i., App. 126.	The Corps of Cavalry under Blueher, . 16,700 The Corps of Lieutenant General York and
(1) Jom. iv. 270, 272. Fain, i. 323, 325. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 33, 34.	Kleist,
(2) French Force at the Buttle of Bautzen.	nant Colonel Stutterheim, 3,700
The Guards under Marshal Mortier, 20,000 3d Corps, Ney,	Total—Prussians, 28,000 Do.—Russians, 68,000
6th Corps, Marshal Mannont.	—Schoell, vol. x., p. 211.
till Corps, Regnier.
11th Corps, Marshal Maedonald, 12,000 12th Corps, Marshal Oudmot, 25,000 tour-Mauliourg,

Grand total, . .

enemy, and venture into the Saxon plains in presence of Napoléon, who had the command of a force in ofold more numerous; and there were not wanting those who called to mind the fatal effects of a similar advance over the control of the similar advance over the control of the similar advance over the control of the similar advance of the similar and victorian of the similar of the similar of the similar conquerors. Seven years of oppressive rule had united every heart, and upraised every hand, in flue north of Germany: the superiorize of the similar conquerors. Seven years of oppressive rule had united every heart, and upraised every hand, in flue north of Germany: the superiorize of the silies in exally removed every reasonable.

favourable tendencies of the cabinet of Venna, Influenced by these considerations rations, the advance of the Allies continued. Leaving the Viceroy, whose troops were cencentrated between Magdeburg and the Saale, to the right, arrangements had been concluded, at halish, mostu on to arrance, established themselves there on the 8th of April (1).

. Program " was descriptive of the last it of the French empire: the hardy warriors, savage horsemen, and enthusiastle volunteers who composed the Russian and Prussian ranks, were still more characteristic of the varied nations, from the deserts of Asia to the centre of civilized Europe, who were now roused to resist them. Unbounded was the astonishment of the citizens of Dresden when the Cossacks and Calmucks. the forerunners of Winzingerode's corps, first appeared amongst them. The uncombed beards and shaggy dress of many of these nomad warriors; their long lances and hardy steeds; and, above, all, the piles of plunder nlich they bore between their saddles and horses' backs, at first excited no small degree of terror in the minds of the citizens, which was increased rather than diminished when they beheld these Aslatic warriors, singing oriental a.rs, pile their arms in the streets, strew a little straw on the payements, and lie slown to rest beside their steeds, picketed to the walls, which had accompanied them from the Volga and the Don. By degrees, however, these appre-" . -- are more found to be kindly and sober;

ways put them lu

arms for hours together, and teating, into a so some all sing in Russian. Shortly after, these rude hosts were followed by the more regular columns of the Russian army: infantry, cavalry, and artillery succeeded each other without intermission, in the finest possible state of discipline and equipment of the regular state of the property of the state of the state defiled over the bridge and stonishment at the aspect of a ni so dreadful a campaign, appeared in all the pomp and majesty of unsullied war. Garlands of flowers were every where strewed on their approach; the windows were filled with rank and beauty, and the monarchs entered the town between a double rank of damsels elothed in white, bearing baskets loaded with all the beauty of spring (1).

But if the long columns of the Russian army, and the varied ap-Appearance But if the long columns of the Russian army, and the varied apositive Prussian troops. pearance of their troops were descriptive of the vast extent of their empire, and the prodigious force of that enthusiasm which had brought the military force of such distant regions into the heart of Europe, still more interesting, in a moral point of view, was the aspect which the patriot bands of Prussia wore. The chasseurs of the guard, in particular, excited general attention, and conveyed a lively idea, both of the sacrifices which her people had made to deliver their country, and of the heroie spirit with which they A thousand young men, almost all of the best families, were animated. marched in the ranks with ardour to battle, where more than two-thirds of their number found an honoured grave. The bands of volunteers, elothed in black, were much more numerous. Many different provinces had contributed to form them: and a large proportion were composed of the young men at the universities, who now took the field under the direction of the same men, as officers, to whom they had formerly listened with reverence in the professors' chairs. Many distinguished members of the universities, in particular Jahn and Staffens, appeared with a warlike air, and surrounded by a numerous band of followers. These distinguished bands, however, though overflowing with courage, and burning to signalize themselves, scarcely appeared broke in to a discipline sufficiently strict for the arduous duties upon which they were about to enter; and many of them were still of such tender years as to be obviously unequal to the fatigues of a campaign. Numbers of these gallant youths, too young to be admitted into the ranks, and hardly able to earry a musket, followed the regiments, supplicating to be allowed to join their elder comrades. One boy of ten years was to be seen, entreating the officers of different regiments, with tears in his eyes, to receive him in the ranks of volunteers, if not as a private, at least as a drummer; while another, only nine, was reelaimed by his parents at Breslau, by advertisement in the Public newspapers (2).

Noble spirit These noble bands took the field, under the sanction, and impressibly which they were ed with the liveliest feelings, of religious duty; it was from that animated. holy spring that the spirit destined to combat, and ultimately conquer, the worldly passions of the French Revolution, took its rise. "We marched," says one of the volunteers, the poet Korner, "in parade from Zoblen to Rogau, a Lutheran village, where the church, with great simplicity, but also with great taste, had been decorated for the convention of the volunteers. After singing a hymn of my composition, the clergyman of the parish delivered an address, full of manly vigour and public enthusiasm. Not a dry eye was to be seen in the whole assembly. After the service he pronounced the oath before us, for the cause of humanity, of fatherland, of religion, to spare neither substance nor soul—to conquer or die for the right. We swore! He then fell on his knees, and besought God for a blessing on His champions. It was a moment when the present thought of death kindled flame in every eye, and beat heroism in every heart. The oath, solemnly repeated by all, and sworn on the swords of the officers, and Luther's hymn,

⁽¹⁾ Timoin oculaire, 85, 86, 109, Odel, ii. 85, (2) Temoin ocul. 94. Odel. ii. 93, 94.

Eine feste burg its unser Gott, (It is a stronghold that is under God.) concluded the ceremony—upon which a thundering unat burst from the congregation of champions for German freedom, while every blade leaped from its scabbard, and gleams of warlike light shone through the sancturry. The hour was so much the more impressive, that most of us went out with the meanour, and the readiness with which they were at an in the complaints, not only of their own troops but of the try were at an in the try were at the try w

- 1 -- - 1 h m in comneh that no small difficulty was hrough (2). But it was chiefly in ollowers to the rites of religion, illied sovereigns and the French od. The day after their entry was daybreak by the soldiers of both armies with extraordinary solumnity, the whole troops appeared in their very best and neatest attire. Lerry where the Cossacks were to be seen buying stained eggs to present to their comrades y hierover the Russian met, from the highest to the lowest rank, they gave the salute, "Christ is risen," to which the reply was, "Les, he is near indeed (3)." The Emperor and the salute of the contraction of the contrac ad-

before the sovereigns at Dresden. Superficient that is may considered as trifles, but they are straws which show how the wind sets; and the reflecting observer will not deem it the least interesting incident in this memorably year, that the sovereigns and armies which at length delivered I will be a sovereigns and armies which at length delivered I will be a sovereigns.

reator; br Rewhen

they went forth to Cross on their bann "he warriors of the buring his stay tion of his arm; gave directions for strengthening the two entaileds of the

(i) Kamer to Caroline was Pickl r, Herela 33

(2) He lakeh led the bessel fol Freed pulses for the substitute of the the that with a situ of the grades of shick had been! It is get the foreserns treast of the children of the better elesses, where arders had been given in the trit instance to allow the gates agricut these sweet introduces be also the gates agricut these sweet introduces be also become was the Lappert Indicated of the Histolium towh Is they had been expended than be go o'd pretions to have those after the far a must and o'd a manual and the despite they prome of high test at. The Angle Er mand the game of the pays prime of Richard beyond the pays prime of Richard which formed his transference from order or, 213 1641.

(1) "Christo westers, mist auto unitre."
(4) this is file 112. Test west is:

town, and putting them in a posture of defence; and established Confusion hospitals for six thousand men. Meanwhile Eugène, firm in his position between the confluence of the Saale and Elbe, and Magdeburg, quietly awaited the approach of the Emperor, who left Erfurth early on the morning of the 28th, mounted on horseback, and commenced the campaign. The conscripts, as the long and brilliant cortège of the Emperor passed through their ranks, gazed with delight on the hero who had filled the world with his renown; and the cheers with which he was saluted were almost as loud and general as in the most brilliant period of his career. But these cheering signs died away when Napoléon had passed; and the first day's march was sufficient to convince every observer that the ancient discipline and order of the army were at an end, and that the admirable precision of the soldiers of Ulm and Austerlitz had been buried with the Grand Army in the snows of Russia. The Emperor slept that night at Eckartsberg, having passed in his journey over the field of Auerstadt, already immortalized in the annals of French glory. During the whole march, the imperial cortege was obliged to force its way, with almost brutal violence, through the dense crowd of infantry, cannon, horsemen, and waggons which encumbered the highway; pillage had already commenced on all sides; and the disorders of the troops not only inflicted on the unhappy inhabitants all the miseries of war, but evinced, even under the eyes of the Emperor, the relaxed discipline and imperfect organization of his army. Under the very windows of the hotel which he inhabited, a vast erowd of disorderly soldiers was collected, who, with lond shouts and dissonant eries, continued during the whole night to feed a huge fire, by throwing into it the furniture, beds, and property, of the wretched inhabitants, into whose houses they had broken, and who, by a single day's presence of the imperial headquarters, found themselves deprived of their whole moveable effects (1).

The direction of Napoleon's march was determined by the imarmles to portant consideration of effecting a junction with the Viceroy towards the mouth of the Saale; and with this view he advanced next day to Naumberg, while Ney reached Weissenfels, after having driven back the Russian videttes, which now, for the first time, began to show themselves on the road. Meanwhile the Viceroy, to facilitate the junction, ascended the course of the Saale, and on the same day arrived at Merseberg, so that the two armies were now not more than twenty miles distant. Eugène's forces consisted of three corps, Victor's, Lauriston's, and Macdonald's, and mustered full forty thousand combatants, besides those left in garrison in the fortresses on the Elbe: already the thunder of their artillery was heard in the distance, and soon an aide-de-camp from the Viceroy announced the joyful intelligence to the Emperor, that his troops had passed the Saale by the bridge of Merseberg, and that a junction had been effected between the two armies. The young conscripts in Ney's corps, which formed the head of the advance, gazed with wonder on the veterans, many of them mutilated, who had survived the Moscow campaign; while they, reanimated by the sight of the dense columns which were hourly thronging to their support, forgot the horrors of the retreat, and fondly hoped that the glorious days of the Grand Army were about to return. Joyfully the united host moved towards the enemy, who occupied Halle, Naumberg, Leipsic, and all the adjacent roads, while the advanced guards proceeded on the road to Weissenfels (2).

Eine feste burg its unser Gott,' (It is a stronghold that is under God,) concluded the ceremony—upon which a thundering used burst from the congregation of champions for German freedom, while every blade leaped from its scabbard, and gleams of warlike light shone through the sanctuary. The hour was so much the more impressive, that most of us went out with the conviction that it was the last time we should ever meet (4)." With such holy

The Emperor and king hved at Dresuen with me numost said city, and h ng et Dresden Incanour, and reli gioss spl cossible to rit by which Saxon per attended only by an aide-de-eamp, and seemed to take a pleasure in the crowds who thronged round him, in so much that no small difficulty sometimes experienced in making his way through (2). But it was chiefly in the respect paid by themselves and their followers to the rites of religion, that the difference appeared between the albed sovereigns and the Trench authorities by which they had been preceded. The day after their entry was Easter Sunda, a transition of the plant of the trench at the sunday at the sunday of the sunday risen," to which the renly was, " les, he is risen indeed (3) " The Emperor before the sovereigns at Dresden Superficial readers may consider messen cidents as trifles, but they are straws which show how the wind sets; and the reflecting observer all not deem at the least interesting incident in this memorably year, that the sovereigns and armies which at length delivered 1 incomments in the first being freater, he lte-

they went forth to the light with the ancient war-cry of the warriors of the Cross on the

Daring h

(1) horner to Carolina von Pieller, Starch 30, 1813 Beutsche Pandora 128 - It - - after the preceding ch 30. In wil ch they had been exposed than be gaved rections to have them a far tief as bound and clear walked not in of worth movil with the spect valuage possed furt intile allier. The King of Ir valuage the same at the royal police of flacks are, who formed has residence—from a reade or 213 Obsti-

^{(3) &}quot; Christos workres -list anne workres." (4) Odel in $11, 112. Teta ocul 1 i town, and putting them in a posture of defence; and established Confusion and disor-ders on the hospitals for six thousand men. Meanwhile Eugène, firm in his position between the confluence of the Saale and Elbe, and Magdeburg, quietly awaited the approach of the Emperor, who left Erfurth early on the morning of the 28th, mounted on horseback, and commenced the campaign. The conscripts, as the long and brilliant cortège of the Emperor passed through their ranks, gazed with delight on the hero who had filled the world with his renown; and the cheers with which he was saluted were almost as loud and general as in the most brilliant period of his career. But these cheering signs died away when Napoléon had passed; and the first day's march was sufficient to convince every observer that the ancient discipline and order of the army were at an end, and that the admirable precision of the soldiers of Ulm and Austerlitz had been buried with the Grand Army in the snows of Russia. The Emperor slept that night at Eckartsberg, having passed in his journey over the field of Auerstadt, already immortalized in the annals of French glory. During the whole march, the imperial cortege was obliged to force its way, with almost brutal violence, through the dense crowd of infantry, cannon, horsemen, and waggons which encumbered the highway; pillage had already commenced on all sides; and the disorders of the troops not only inflicted on the unhappy inhabitants all the miseries of war, but evinced, even under the eyes of the Emperor, the relaxed discipline and imperfect organization of his army. Under the very windows of the hotel which he inhabited, a vast crowd of disorderly soldiers was collected, who, with lond shouts and dissonant cries, continued during the whole night to feed a huge fire, by throwing into it the furniture, beds, and property, of the wretched inhabitants, into whose houses they had broken, and who, by a single day's presence of the imperial headquarters, found themselves deprived of their whole moveable effects (1).

The direction of Napoléon's march was determined by the imarmies to portant consideration of effecting a junction with the Viceroy towards the mouth of the Saale; and with this view he advanced next day to Naumberg, while Ney reached Weissenfels, after having driven back the Russian videttes, which now, for the first time, began to show themselves on the road. Meanwhile the Viceroy, to facilitate the junction, ascended the course of the Saale, and on the same day arrived at Merseberg, so that the two armies were now not more than twenty miles distant. Eugène's forces consisted of three corps, Victor's, Lauriston's, and Macdonald's, and mustered full forty thousand combatants, besides those left in garrison in the fortresses on the Elbe: already the thunder of their artillery was heard in the distance, and soon an aide-de-camp from the Viccroy announced the joyful intelligence to the Emperor, that his troops had passed the Saale by the bridge of Merseberg, and that a junction had been effected between the two armies. The young conscripts in Ney's corps, which formed the head of the advance, gazed with wonder on the veterans, many of them mutilated, who had survived the Moscow campaign; while they, reanimated by the sight of the dense columns which were hourly thronging to their support, forgot the horrors of the retreat, and fondly hoped that the glorious days of the Grand Army were about to return. Joyfully the united host moved 30th April. towards the enemy, who occupied Halle, Naumberg, Leipsic, and all the adjacent roads, while the advanced guards proceeded on the road to Weissenfels (2).

Postton and No sooner were the Allies aware of the approach of the enemy in the Allies such strength, than they took measures to concentrate their forces, but the situation of their troops was such as to afford the most serious ground for disquietude. Not more than eighty thousand men were seattered along the line of the Elbe, from the Robemian mountains to the sea, without any other nort of support than Bresden, a town which could not be said to be fortified The bridges of Meissen, Muhlberg, and Rosslau, by which they had passed, were not yet even covered by tites-de-nont-Dessau alone had a tolerable bridge-bead, and the reinforcements in their rear were all absorbed an blood a long the forteeress on the Piles on 1 the Oder The Atrees influence which their advance had produced in Germany, and, by renewing ats terrors, might revive all the yaeillations of the caboet of Vienoa, and even induce it to throw its forces into the opposite scale. Nor were the chances of battle so unequal as they at first sight appeared, for though Napoléon was greatly superior upon the whole, it was by no means certain that his forces would all be concentrated upon one field; the quality of the allied troops was undoubtedly better than the conscripts by whom they were to be opposed; and, above all, the creat superiority of their cavalry, which was nearly twenty-five thousand strong, while that of the French was not five thousand both precluded the possibility of total defeat, and promised the most brilliant results in case of success (1).

These considerations having induced the allied sovereigns to risk desin of a battle, it was no sooner ascertained that Napolcon had passed the Marshet Saale, near Weissenfels, on the 30th April, than the Russian and Prussian forces were moved forward with all imaginable expedition, to prevent his advance to Leipsic, give him battle in the plains of Lutzen, and drive him back, in case of success, into the marshes formed by the Pleisse and tho Elster. The Prussian army was concentrated, on the 1st May, at Roethe: Wittgenstein, with the main body of the Russians, was at Zwenkau, while Winzingerode and Milaradowitch, more in advance, observed the movements of the enemy on the roads of Naumberg and Chemnitz. It was in crossing the defile of Grunebach, that the head of the French column first encountered the Allies, who were strongly posted with six guns on the heights of Poserna, as at the battle of the Pyramids in Egypt Blarshal Bessieres, Duke of Istria, colonel of the Imperial Guards, was among the foremost of the horsemen who advanced to reconnectee the enemies' position, when a cannon-shot he marshal. -ball struck was immediately covered with a white sheet, to concerl the calamity from the soldiers; and no one spoke of the event even at the imperial headquarters-an omlions practice, which commenced during the calamities of the Moscow retreat, and has continued in this compaign, from the rapid consumption of men of the highest rank and consideration by which it was characterized. Great confusion prevailed for some time at the attack of the defile on the opposite side, from the want of precision in the movements of the troops, and three hundred men were struck down in the squares without the enemy being dislodged; but at length twenty pieces of the artillery of the Guard were brought up, and under cover of their fire the leading square got through, and the allied vanguard retired, leaving open to the enemy the entrance of the plain of Lutzen (1). The French army occupied Lutzen and the adjacent villages, where they slept; the young guard bivouacked round the tomb of Gustavus Adolphus; sentinels were placed, to preserve from destruction during the night the trees which shaded the grave of the hero of the north (2).

Next morning the French troops, being aware that they were in presence of the enemy, advanced in close order towards Leipsic, ready at a moment's warning to form square, to resist the formidable cavalry to which they were opposed. General Lauriston, with his corps, the advanced guard of Eugène's army, moved on the road from Merseberg; he met with no resistance till he arrived at Lindenau, the western suburb of Leipsic; but there the streets were barricadoed, and the houses loopholed; and, as a serious resistance was expected, the troops halted, and the fire of artillery commenced. Maedonald's eorps followed on the same line, and neither of these were engaged in the subsequent action. On the great road from Lutzen to Leipsic, the main body of the French army, under Napoléon in person, advanced in a dense array of infantry, eavalry, artillery, and ehariots, crowding the road from Weissenfels to Lindenau; and it seemed hardly possible for any efforts to restore order to the prodigious aeeumulation of men and earriages which were there assembled. Marmont's eorps formed the vanguard of the array; next to him, Bertrand brought up his Italians from Nossen; behind them, between Naumberg and Weissenfels, came Oudinot's men; while the Imperial Guards and reserve cavalry were still further in the rear, and Ney's dense columns eovered the flank of the huge array as far as Lutzen (5).

On the other hand, the allied sovereigns, who had taken the field on the 29th April, and put themselves at the head of their respective armies, were resolved to give battle in the plains of Lutzen. Not that they were insensible of the risk which they ran in combating Napoléon at the head of superior forces, especially in the thickly studded villages of Saxony, where their magnificent cavalry would be of little avail; but political considerations of the highest importance, connected with the courts of Vienna and Dresden, forbade them to recede or act on the defensive at this particular juncture. They crossed the Elster, therefore, near Pegau, early on the morning of the 2d, and advanced with all their forces, directing their march towards Jena, and threatening the enemy's right, so as to keep

⁽¹⁾ Ever since the campaign of Italy, in 1796, Marshal Bessières had, in different ranks, commanded the guard which accompanied Napoleon in his battles. He was one of his most esteemed lientenants; and he deserved the Emperor's regard, as well by his military experience and ability, as by his talent for exvil affairs and his fidelity to his interests. His body was embalmed, and arrived at the Hotal des Invahdes, at Paris, on the 20th Bays, where it was interred; and the Emperor wrote the following touching letter to his widow, who was inconstable for his loss:—"My coustn: Your husband has died on the field of honour. The loss which you and you children have sustained is doubtless grant; but mine is still greater. The linke of letria has died the noblest death, and without suffering;

he has left a reputation without spot, the best inheritance he could bequeath to his children. My protection is secured to them; they will inherit all the affection which I bore to their father.',—When the author visited Paris, in May 1814, the lamps were burning night and day in the mausoleum of the deceased, by the pious care of his widow, who still daily visited and spent some time in his tomb. The King of Saxony erected a monument to Bessières, on the spot where he fell.—See Fair, i. 314, 345; and Las Cases, vi. 45.

⁽²⁾ Souv. de Caulaincourt, i. 163. Fain, i. 311, 313. Odel. i. 16. Jom. iv. 275, 276. Vict. et Conq. axii. 31, 32.

⁽³⁾ Tain, i. 249, 249, Vict. et Gonq. xxii, 32, 33. Jon. iv. 276, 277.

up the communication with Bohemia and the force, of the Austrian monarchy The plan of attack was to refuse their own right, and make no considerable effort in the centre, but endeadour to force back the enemy's right, turn it and cut him off from the Saale, and then muddate his rear with a numerou cavalry, to which he had no corresponding force to oppose Blucher's Prussians were in the front; next came Wittgenstein's Russians: Winnogerole's Russians, with the Russian and Prussian gnards, and the cavalry of bott armies, formed the reserve in this order the troops, after having chipped at hour and a half's rest, advanced to the attack at one o'clock in the after noon (4).

Battle of Latter manner for both were in open column, and actually under march, and they came into collision like two men-of-war attempting to pass each passed the monument of Gustarus Adolphus, when he was first roused to? sense of his situation by the sound of artillery on his extreme left at Lindenau. He immediately halited with his suite, and surreyed the distant combat with his telescope, after which he remained half an hour in meditation, directing the troops merely to continue their march, with their ranks as close as possible. Suddenly a fremendous cannonade orose in rear of his right, in the direction of Great and Little Görschen, while his telescope, still directed towards Lindenau, showed him the inhabitants peaceably posted on the roofs of the houses, and no enemy's force deployed beyond the extremity of the compared in truth, matters had assumed a serious aspect, from the very market first, in that quarter. The French infantry there occupied the villential lago of Gross Gorschen, klein Gorschen, Ralino, and hala, which he saw the rear cach other, somewhat in the form of an Irregular square, in the plain between luttern and Pegan The plain is there traversed by the deep channel of a raulet, called the Flossgraben, which was crossed by the whole combined army in small compact columns, and formed a support to the right after these columns land deployed. Emerging from behind the lengths, where they had taken their rest entirely concealed frem the enemy's traw, the Giled army, eighty thousand strong, moved on in four deep black columns, with a powerful ortillery in front, which immediately companed a heavy concentre fire upon Gros Gorschen; which the French infantry in Soon, however, it was

which was charged with its defence, was driven out and pursued to some distance. The brave Prussians burning with ordour, followed up their success with the utmost impetuoisty; klein Görchen and Rahno were olso carried amidst deafting cheers; both villages were speedily wrapped in flames, black volumes of

⁽¹⁾ Preside la Camp 1813 School Breastli. (2) Lood 22 22 Presis Schooli, Feç. in 205 205 200 201 Chief. 18, 19 205 201 Chief. 18, 19 205 205 201 Chief. 19 205 Pass. 1 310, 331. Presis in School; Accordin, 19 203 207.

The Emperor's resolution was instantly taken. "We have no Napol(on's measures to eavalry," said he. "No matter: it will be a battle as in Egypt; the reput the disorder. French infantry is equal to any thing, and I commit myself, without alarm, to the inherent valour of our young conscripts." Orders were immediately dispatched to Macdonald, who was on the left near Lindenau, to retrace his steps, and direct his march to the point of attack on the right; the Viceroy, gifted with the true eye of a general, had already stopped his advance on hearing the cannon to the right, and enjoined him to incline in that direction; orders were simultaneously sent to Marmont to hasten across the fields in the same direction; Bertrand was instructed to advance, as quickly as possible, on the other side; while the whole troops on the road between Lutzen and Leipsie were at once halted, and wheeled into line by a movement to the right. Napoléon himself set off with his suite in the same direction, directing his rapid course to the point where the smoke was thickest and the cannon loudest; but before these various succours could arrive, disasters wellnigh attended with fatal consequences, had ensued in that direction (1).

Wittgenstein, overjoyed at the success of his first attack, which had answered his most sanguine expectations, resolved to support it to the utmost of his power, and direct his principal forces in that quarter, while at the same time he distracted the enemy's attention, by a furious onset upon his centre. He brought up therefore his second line, and a part of his reserves, which had now become necessary; for Ney, having moved forward the divisions Brenier, Gérard, and Marchand, to the support of Souham, which advanced in squares, as at the battle of the Pyramids, had, by a brilliant charge with the bayonet, regained the lost villages, and driven back the Allies almost to the ground they occupied at the commencement of the action. A few words addressed by the Prussian generals to their men when the second line came up, restored their confidence, and they returned to the attack of the burning villages with redoubled ardour. Nothing could withstand their impetuosity. The French columns, driven out of the houses, were charged in the intervening open ground by the allied horse, and thrown into confusion. Several regiments of conscripts disbanded and fled: the plain was covered with fugitives, and dismay overspread the whole French right. Seeing his attack thus far successful, Wittgenstein brought up his reserves of the Russians and Prussians to decide the victory: these noble troops advanced in the finest order, through a driving tempest of cannon shot from the French batteries, and, pressing incessantly forward, carried the villages of Klein Görschen and Hahalali by assault, and drove the enemy beyond Kaia, the key of the French right, which became the prey of the flames, and remained burning furiously, unoccupied by either party. The French whole line, in the centre and on the right, retired five or six hundred paces, abandoning also the village of Starsiedel, which the Allies, however, were not in sufficient strength to occupy. It was now six o'clock; the battle seemed gained: the French right, driven backed mile-and-a-haif, had not only been expelled from the five villages which formed its strongholds, but in great part thrown into disorder (2). Half-an-hour's further advance would bring the Allies upon the line of Bertrand's march forward, and cut him off from the remainder of the army; while their numerous and magnificent cavalry were already forming in dense and menacing masses to sweep along the open plains, in the rear of the whole enemy's centre and left, and complete his destruction in a quarter, and by a force to which he had nothing to oppose.

Napoléon hastens to the r ght to resto e the battle nminence of the danger. The dreadful fire of the Russian were retreating, closely fol-loved by the allied infantry, and the threatening clouds of their horse were preparing to deluge the field the moment that the last villages were passed Net, even in these circumstances of alarm, the Emperor received the most . touching proof of the devotion of his troops, the broken growds of conscripts reformed in haste at the sight of the imperial staff, and endcayoured, by forming little knots or squares, to arrest the disorder, numbers rejoined the ranks which still held together, the wounded, which were carried past in numbers every minute increasing, never failed to salute the Emperor with the wonted acclamations—crics of "Vive l'Empereur!" broke from his soon about to be silent in death, and a faint expression of joy illbminated the countenances of the dying vonths when the Well-known form of Agnolion flitted before their eyes. Never had the French army displayed more devoted valour-never did the generals and officers evince a more heroic spirit-and never, except perhaps at Wagram, had the Emperor exposed his person more than at that awful crisis But he was deeply impressed with the danger of his situation; orders were already given for a retreat, and when an aide-decamp brought the intelligence, as he came up, that Ney's second attack on han had failed, he received the news with a terrific evelamation-" Ital" accompanied by a look to Berthier and Caulameourt, which froze every heart around him with horror (1) ...

best jews. Both parties, perceiving that the decisive point of the hattle was first to be found in the ruins of hais, strove, by accumulating forces in the property of the pr inconsiderable piece on the board.

tauce behind the village, arranged which had been already engaged, preceded by the division Ricard, with his aide-de-camp Count Lohau at their head, for a fresh attack. These gallant sued in the plain between the two; Gerard and Brenier both fell severely the Berlin volunteers melted away under the fire, but stood immoveable;

⁽¹⁾ Old i 51, 57 Join ir 251, 717 Lond 23

The moment was very set if all the Emperor called the to he sid , and asked, where were the treasure and eye pages "I have executed arpled s free but a marked trust and p to se make their trees and edges of loos imbase. It has east frees a trust of the control and the control and both patiles kept their ground with undaunted resolution, and as the shades of evening began to ever over the field, the flashes of the unsketry on either side appeared fixed to one spot, and almost close to each other (1).

This obstinate conflict, however, gained for Napoleon what he aloue regulred to great their hard-rarned ancresses from the Allies Solutter is 🕠 time. While the goudat was caging between Kaia and klein Goes schen, the other corps of the French army came up; the Imperial Guard was now assembled close behind Kala In reserve, with Napoleon at its head; Bers trand's forces were on the one side. Marmont's infantry issued from the willow thickers, which adjoined the Florengaben, on the other. Seventy thousand From h bulletry pressed upon the Allies, who at that paint had not more than forty thousand to oppose to them. As a last effect, Wittgenstein ordered the artillery of General Whishgerodo to march forward, and take the enemy, combating between the villages, on their left flank, while his infantry and Nanced to the support of the new almost exhausted Prussians. This able manouvro had at first a surprising success; and of his divisions debouched from Photori, beyond the Plossgrabon streamlet, and drove back Marchand's division of Marmout's troops; while another reinforced the Prussians between the villages, and with the aid of the guns on the enemy's flank, a third time with lond shouts droye him out of kiem Gorschen and kaia, and back to the Imperial Guard of Napoléon. An interesting yet melaurholy incident took place in the contest for the burning villages; the volunteers of Berlin and the young conscripts of Paris met amidst the rules; both made their first essay in arms, but both fought with the comage of veterm soldiers, hand to hand, body to body, heart to heart; these gallant youths siringled with invincible obstinacy amidst the flames, and nearly a half of each found there an undinely gane (").

Napoleon now saw that the decisive moment had arrived; all his officerat No Poolish Turns veserves within reach, except the imperial duals, had been on gaged. He forthwith drew out that formidable host, which had so often deelded the fite of Puropean fields, Sixteen lattalions of the young guard were drawn up in a close column, preceded by sixty pieces of its incomparable artiflery, commanded by Dronot, and followed by the whole issome caralege. This weighty column soon made its way through the croud of digitives, which by in its line of advance. Aothing could withstand the swift and deadly the of Dranot Sames, which seemed absolutely to be decileated as they moved along a hala was regained, and the Allies foresid back, still Going abour, and dring to Icloin Garschen. The Prussian battalions were now so untelereduced by eight hours' incosant fighting, that they formed little more than a line of rivillenes, which was obliged to full back behind that village to reform. There, however, the right was renewed; Mortier had a horse shot under blux Dumoustier foll by his side; while on the Prussian side Scharu. horst was mortally wounded, the Prince Expedd of Hexe Homberg and Prince Mecklenberg Strelly killeds but the thank employed by clouds of dust and smoke, still steadily advanced, and the receding sound of their aropen plains, in the rear of the whole enemy's centre and left, and complete his destruction in a quarter, and by a force to which he had nothing to oppose.

No sooner were these disastrous tidings brought to Nanoli on, than Nanoleon he set out at the rallop to restore affairs by his own presence at the the meht to scene of this terrible conflict. On approaching the right wing, > cetan r followed by the allied infantry, and the threatening clouds of their horse were preparing to deluge the field the moment that the last villages were passed. Net, even in these circumstances of alarm, the Emperor received the most touching proof of the devotion of his troops, the broken eronds of conscripts reformed in haste at the sight of the imperial staff, and endeavoured, by forming little knots or squares, to arrest the disorder, numbers recomed the ranks which still held together, the wounded, which were carried past in numbers every minute increasing, never failed to salute the Emperor with the wonted acclamations—cries of "Vive PEmpereur!" broke from his soon about to be silent in death, and a faint expression of nov illiminated the countenances of the dring youths when the well-known form of Annolion flitted before their eyes. Never had the French army displayed more devoted valour mover did the generals and officers evince a more heroic spirit and never, except perhaps at Wagram, had the Emperor exposed his person more than at that awful crisis. But he was deeply impressed with the danger of his situation orders were already given for a retreat, and when an aide-det Ney's second attack on around lum with horror (1) ...

. fic exclamation-" Ha!" . which frozo every heart

Productors Both parties, perceiving that the decisive point of the battle was both to to be found in the ruins of haia, strove, by accumulating forces at the deer upon it, to secure to themselves so important an acquisition, like two skilful players at chess, who successively bring up all their forces to support the attack or 1 f inconsiderable niece o

tance belund the villa which had been already engaged, preceded by the division Ricard, with his aide-de-camp Count Lobau at their head, for a fresh attack. These gallant ever, issued with the utinost vigour from that village; a furious combat ensued in the plan between the two; Gerard and Brenier both fell severely wounded at the head of their troops, the former exclaining, " Soldiers, the moment is arrived when every Frenchman who has the feelings of honour in his bosom should conquer or die " Nor would the Prussians recede an inch; the Berlin volunteers melted away under the fire, but stood immoveable;

⁽¹⁾ Old 1 St, 57 Jan. 17 251 733 Lond 23 Seek to) excherge it is one ralying post in the Sci cell Prec is 309

[&]quot;The time ent was arry er tiesl the Lapern cal rel me to bis stir, and asked, where were the

Live not a mount then, and he, "to move there are not moved the set of the page moved then are at Laters and move the set of the set upy, dor so the clares that he Portant po lat,"-Jou care ar De use, lu, 422

both parties kept their ground with undaunted resolution, and as the shades of evening began to creep over the field, the flashes of the musketry on either side appeared fixed to one spot, and almost close to each other (1).

This obstinate conflict, however, gained for Napoleon what he alone required to wrest their hard-earned successes from the Allies and Prench -time. While the combat was raging between Kaia and Klein Gorschen, the other corps of the French army came up; the Imperial Guard was now assembled close behind Kaia in reserve, with Napoléon at its head; Bertrand's forces were on the one side, Marmont's infantry issued from the willow thickets, which adjoined the Flossgraben, on the other. Seventy thousand French infantry pressed upon the Allies, who at that point had not more than forty thousand to oppose to them. As a last effort, Wittgenstein ordered the artillery of General Winzingerode to march forward, and take the enemy, combating between the villages, on their left flank, while his infantry advanced to the support of the now almost exhausted Prussians. This able manœuvre had at first a surprising success; one of his divisions debonched from Eisdorf, beyond the Flossgraben streamlet, and drove back Marchand's division of Marmont's troops; while another reinforced the Prussians between the villages, and with the aid of the guns on the enemy's flank, a third time with loud shouts drove him out of Klein Görschen and Kaia, and back to the Imperial Guard of Napoleon. An interesting yet melancholy incident took place in the contest for the burning villages; the volunteers of Berlin and the young conscripts of Paris met amidst the ruins; both made their first essay in arms, but both fought with the courage of veteran soldiers, hand to hand, body to body, heart to heart; these gallant youths struggled with invincible obstinacy amidst the flames, and nearly a half of each found there an untimely grave (2).

Napoleon now saw that the decisive moment had arrived: all his charge of the french reserves within reach, except the Imperial Guard, had been engaged. He forthwith drew out that formidable host, which had so often decided the fate of European fields. Sixteen battalions of the young guard were drawn up in a close column; preceded by sixty pieces of its incomparable artillery, commanded by Drouot, and followed by the whole reserve cavalry. This weighty column soon made its way through the crowd of fugitives, which lay in its line of advance. Nothing could withstand the swift and deadly fire of Drouot's guns, which seemed absolutely to be discharged as they moved along: Kaia was regained, and the Allies forced back, still facing about, and firing to Klein Görschen. The Prussian battalions were now so much reduced by eight hours' incessant fighting, that they formed little more than a line of tirailleurs, which was obliged to fall back behind that village to reform. There, however, the fight was renewed; Mortier had a horse shot under him; Dumoustier fell by his side: while on the Prussian side Scharnhorst was mortally wounded, the Prince Leopold of Hesse Homberg and Prince Mecklenberg Strelitz killed; but the Guard, enveloped by clouds of dust and smoke, still steadily advanced, and the receding sound of their ar-

⁽¹⁾ Vict. et Conq. xxii. 38, 39. Jom. iv. 282, 283. Precis in Schoell, Recueil, ii. 309, 310.

⁽²⁾ Fain, i. 359, 360 Guil, de Vaud Camp. de 1813, 81. Jom. iv. 282, 283. Precis in Schooll, Recueil, ii 311, 312.

[&]quot;I had nothing," said Ney to General Mathieu Dumas after the battle, "but had alions of conscripts; but I had good reason to congratulate myself on their conduct, I doubt if I could have achieved as much with the grenadiers of the guard. I had before me the best troops of the enemy, including the whole Prussian Guard; our bravest wareiers, after having twice failed, would probably have never carried the villages; but five times I led back those brave youths, whose docility, and perhaps inexperience, have served me better than the most veteran valour; the French i can so well too young."—Souvenirs de 3.

102

٠.,

differe and light of their guns showed that the enemy was in retreat on the right. At the same time the Viceroy, who at this critical moment came in from Lindenan fell on the extreme right of the Prince of Wittemberg, and drew off his batteries from the flank of the columns engaged among the vil-

most violence along the whole line till darkness closed in the scene, and several charges of the allied horse upon the French squares were followed by brilliant success: but although they retained the greater part of the ground they had won on the right and in the centre, it was evident they were overmatched at the decisive point; the Russian and Prussian guards, who were "impatiently expected, had not yet come up", a reinforcement of two divisions Fre m . n . f . M. Hant al handled that they were obliged to retreat, and evacuate the village of Eisdorf : while, on the extreme left of the 'Allies' line, Bertrand's corps was deboneling by Gossereau and Pobles, and threatened early next morning to assail the disputed villages in flank. In these eigenmetaners, the allied sovereigns gave orders for a retreat on the following morning: they themselves retired for the night to I obstadt; the right was concentrated in and around Gross Görschen, where it sunk to sleep amidst the smoking ruins; and Nanoleon dispatched couriers to Paris, Cracow, Rome, Vienna, and Constantinople, to announce that he had gained the victory (1).

Strict orders had been given by the Emperor that na pursuit should tack of the attempted; he was well aware of his inferiority in cavalry, and on the line liaving observed that a considerable part of the allied borse had not been engaged, he feared some surprise during the night. To guard against such a danger, fires were directed to be Lindled along the whole front of the French position, and the men were ordered to be down in squares. It soon appeared how necessary these precautions had been. As Napoléon was riding at nine at night across part of the field of battle towards Lutzen, where headquarters were to be established, he was suddenly assailed by a fire of musketry from behind a hedge, followed by the irruption of a hige mass of horse, which advanced in close order and at a steady pace through the squares, almost to the imperial escort. Had they pushed on two hundred paces further, they would have taken the Emperor with all his suite. As it was, the alarm was so great that all his followers dispersed : Napoléon himself disappeared for some minutes, and the anxious question was asked by them all, when they re-assembled, "Where Is the Emperor?" Some squares having now come up, and poured in a close fire on both sides, the allied horse got entangled in the darkness in a ravine, and at length the body which had made this irruption, consisting of eight squadrons, retired to their own position; and the combat at all points ceased in this sea of blood (2),

At day dreak on the following morning, Napoli on left I utzen, and, according to his usual custom, rode over the field of battle. It afforded ample subject for meditation, and evinced clearly the obstinate and nearly balanced nature of the conflict in which the French empire was now engaged. Between the villages of Kaia and Gross Gorschen, the whole surface of the ground was covered with the slain, of whom above two-thirds were French. The dead on their side were about six, the wounded twelve thousand (1). The youthful visages and slender figures of a great proportion of the corpses on both sides, presented at once a melancholy and an interesting spectacle; and showed at once how war had strained the military strength of both monarchies, and what ardent passions had mutually inspired their people. Many of the dead bodies were those of the Prussian landwehr and landsturm. The French gazed with astonishment on the long hair, rough mien, and coarse garments of these rural combatants, most of whom were not yet in uniform, but lay on the field in their dress from the plough; but Napoléon viewed them with very different feelings, and mused long on these decisive proofs of the universal spirit which had drawn forth in Prussia "the might that slumbers in a peasant's arm." The troops saluted him with their accustomed acclamations, and appeared to have lost none of their wonted enthusiasm. Nothing appeared so extraordinary to his attendants as the immense army which had in a manner sprung up out of the earth at his summons, and the admirable spirit with which it was animated (2).

⁽¹⁾ Pravilin Official Account Schort I 44 13 Fain 1 301, 307 Precipin Schooli fier is 312, 313 Juni 19 253 254 Natl et Conquestis 39 40 (2) Odel 1 27, 59 Fain, 1 396 387 Lond 21 Prec a la Petuch by Schoell, ii 313 311

The battle of Lutzen must always be considered as one of the and reflect most striking proofs of Napoléon's military abilities. Though the success gained was far from being decisive, the Allies having retreated next day in admirable order, without the sacrifice either of prisoners, standards, or cannon, and with a loss of only fifteen thousand men, while the French were weakened by eighteen thousand, of whom nine hundred were' prisoners; yet a most important advantage had been gained by the first suecess in the campaign, and the restoration of the credit of their arms in the eyes of Europe, by having forced the veteran bands of Russia to retreat, with an army for the most part composed of young conscripts. Although, also, the superjority of numbers upon the whole was decidedly on the side of the French; yet this was far from being the case with the forces actually engaged, until a late period of the day. The Allies selected their own point of attacks their movements were so admirably screened from the enemy by the numerous light horse which covered their movements, that, though they bivouacked within two leagues of the French right on the night preceding, their vicinity was not even suspected; and when the attack on Gross Gorschen commenced at ten o'clock on the morning of the 2d, Ney's corps alone was at hand to resist it, while the remainder of the army was spread over a line thirty miles in length, from the gates of Leipsic to the banks of the Saale. Surprised in this manner in a scattered line of march by the unforeseen onset of the enemy in concentrated masses on his right and centre, Napoléon ran the most imminent hazard of seeing his army pierced through the middle, and severed in twain by an enemy whose superiority in cavalry would have enabled him speedily to convert such a disaster into total ruin. Had Wittgenstein had his reserves better in hand, and followed up the capture of Klein Görschen and Kaia at the moment with adequate forces there can be little doubt that this result would have taken place. It was the highest effort of the military art, therefore, in Napoléon, to restore the battle after such an advantage had been gained, and such a surprise incurred; to arrest the enemy's advance by

Conq. xxii. 42, 43.

⁽¹⁾ Ney's corps alone lost twelve thousand men and five hundred officers, killed and wounded The number of wounded was so great, that the generals accused the young conscripts with having injured themselves to escape the fatigues and dangers of the cumpaign—Journ, iv. 285.

(2) Odel. i. 59, 62. Fain, i. 367, 369. Vict. et obstinate resistance in the only situation where, from the proximity of the villages, it could be attempted, and prolong the combat till the concentration of his forces from both sides enabled him to assume the offensive with superior strength (1) neverther During the action, Bulow had carried the town of Halle by astio Bredes sault, and taken six guns; but the turn which affairs had taken on the plan of Lutzen, rendered been important, of no avail T'

APIT order, towards Dres and, passing on without halting, took the road of Silesia, where a strong intended position had for some time been prepared at BUTZEY. Notwithstanding the methodical arrangements, however, and short marches of the retreat, considerable confusion soon ensued; ten thousand charlots, more

French, and prevented the most serious disasters. The retreat was conducted in two columns the Russians retired by Chemnitz and Freyberg, followed by Bertraud and Oudinot , the Prussians by the great road from Leipsic to Dresden, pursued by Lauriston, Marmont, Eugene, and the Imperial Guard; while Ney moved upon Torgau and Wittenberg to menace Berlin Ney, with his corps, which had suffered so severely in the battle, was at first left to rest some days on the field, in order to bury the dead and reform its ranks The Emperor, however, intended, that while the bulk of his army followed the allied sovereigns into Silesia, that gallant marshal should receive a recompense for his valour, by being sent against Berlin; and thitlier accordingly lie was soon directed. Severe combats with the rearguard 6-2 took place at Fuderf, Aossen, and Wilidruf; but the French obtained no advantage, and Milaradowitch, who commanded the rearguard. after cutting the arches of the bridge of Dresden (2), which had been restored in a temporary manner, took post in force among the houses on the right bank

When the French army approached Bresden, even the meanest of the pretable wild present and the pretable which present a state of the special except the feath of the special except and the state of the french and the state of the first green and flowers of spring. The ascending sun glittered with dazzing brightness on the steeples, dones, and palaces of the city; calimness and peace seemed to have narked it for their own; no sound of alarm or sign of devastation was yet perceptible in its smiting envirous. But war in its most terrible form was about to prey upon this devoted capital; for six long months it was to be the scene of combats, of suffering, and of blood; and already, amidst all the huxurance of opening nature, the symptoms, as yet brilliant and ingester, of mintary preparations were to be seen.

he stated at a ner a libres og hen a few words. The she uts of joy from the latted a resonnied over the

⁽f) Kanwag of white tal furposture surcess a Laten was a seriel to energy of an advance when the return of an advance when the return of a return when the return of any first to making the up to the kindle of the control of the con

⁽²⁾ Lond 2. 70 Sate, 370 373 Jess (v. 237, Old i, 63 66

In those orchards, the glitter of bayonets could be discerned; on every height of those hills, artillery was planted: two black columns of smoke announced the burning of the temporary bridges, above and below the city, which the Russians had erected, while occasional cannon shot from the right bank, still in the hands of the Allies, mingled with the clang of the bells which announced the approach of Napoleon on the left. The few remaining Cossacks swam their horses across the Elbe after the bridges were destroyed; and Dresden, wholly evacuated by the Allies, but in the deepest terror and anxiety, awaited the arrival of the conqueror (1).

To deprecate his wrath, which the decided favour the inhabitants had shown to the allied eause gave them every reason to apprehend, into Dresthe magistrates waited upon Napoléon a mile and a half from the city, on the road to Freyberg. "Who are you?" said he in a quick and rude tone. "Members of the municipality," replied the trembling burgomasters. "Have you bread?" "Our resources have been entirely exhausted by the requisitions of the Russians and Prussians." "Ha! it is impossible, is it? I know no such word; get ready bread, meat, and wine. I know all you have done: you richly deserve to be treated as a conquered people; but I forgive all from regard to your king: he is the saviour of your country; you have been already punished by having had the Russians and Prussians amongst you, and being governed by Baron Stein." With these words he turned aside from the city, and, directing his horse towards the suburbs of Pirna, traversed the ramparts of the town, as far as the road which leads to . Pilnitz; he there dismounted, and walked on foot, accompanied only by Caulaincourt and a page, to the banks of the river, at the point where the Russians had constructed their bridge of boats. The Viceroy soon after joined them, and the Emperor and he advanced alone to the water's edge, while the Russian guns were still occasionally firing from the opposite side. Having completed his observations, without injury, in that quarter, and made himself master by enquiry of the whole particulars attending that vicinity, he proceeded to the other side of the town, beyond Fredericstadt, where the bridge of rafts near Ubigau was still for the most part standing, not more than one-third having been consumed by the fire which the Russians had applied to it. Some light horsemen threw themselves into boats, approached the burning pile, extinguished the flames, and drew nearly two-thirds of the bridge in safety to the left bank. Having secured this important acquisition, his next care was to reconnoitre the banks still further down; and having discovered a place near Preisnitz, where the heights on the left bank overtopped those on the right, and a curve in the stream broke the force of the current, he gave orders for the construction of a bridge of rafts there with all possible expedition (2).

Napolcon's preparations Disquieting intelligence having been received in the evening from for the passage of the Eibe. Disquieting intelligence having been received in the evening from to the passage of the Eibe. Torgau, where the governor not only still persisted in refusing to admit a French garrison, but alleged in his vindication the express orders of his sovereign, a special messenger was dispatched to the King of Saxony to know whether he still adhered to the confederation of the Rhine, accompanied by an intimation, that "if he did not forthwith return to his capital, he should lose his kingdom." On the following morning, Napoléon was on horseback by daybreak, urging on in person the preparations for the passage of the river under the heights of Preisnitz. The engineers had made

⁽¹⁾ Odel. i. 66, 67. Témoin Ocul. i. 120, 123. Odel. ii. 120. Fain, i. 373, 875. Personal Observation.

(2) Odel. i. 68, 70. Fain, i. 379, 380. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 43, 44.

extraordinary efforts during the night; the bridge of rafts was speedily renaired; the marines from Brest had powerfully seconded the land engineers.

panied by fifty pieces of cannon, to the haux opposite Unique in the deep hooming of the literalleurs was to be heard on both sides of the river, and the deep hooming of the Russian cannon at intervals, showed that a serious resistance was intended. No sooner did Napoléon see the preparations of the

P-and disposed them on the heights of commanded tience of the one drove from a piece of reast," said he, calmly, "all was over." It soon, however, appeared that the French artiller, was superior, both in number and position, to that to which they were opposed; and as the object of the Russians was not to defend the passage of the river, which him well know against such a general and army was impossible, but only to sented themselves; heavy rains, and the menting of the boncom. I raised a flood in the Elbe; anchors, cables, and grappling from were wanting, and, after two days for unprofitable labour, the undertaking was abandoned. It was deemed easier to restore, in a temporary manner, the two arches which had been out in the bridge of Deesden. By the indefatigable evertions of the French engineers, the preparations were pushed forward with with such activity, that, by ten o'clock on the morning of the 11th, all was ready even for the passage of the artiller; and the whole corps of the Viceroy, Marmont, and Bertrand were crossed over. They found the opposite suburb entirely evacuated by the enemy, who were in full retreat to the great intrenched position, where they intended to give battle, at Bautzen. Such was the impatience of the Emperor for the completion of the passage (1), that he promised a napoleon to every boat which was ferried across, and during the whole of the 11th he remained seated on a stone bench on the bridge, listening to the shouts of the young conscripts as they passed over, and feasting his eyes with the long trains of artillery, which seemed to be destined to hurl to the right bank of the Elbe all the horrors of war which had hitherto devastated the left.

1

On the following day, the King of Saxony gave a clear proof of the terror which Napoleon's success had inspired, by arriving in perto Dresden son at Dresden, to place himself and all his resources at the disposal and his of the French emperor. This proceeding was in the highest degree ence to the gratifying to Napoleon, who thus not only saw secured the adhe-Napoléoo. rence of an important ally and valuable army, in possession of fortresses of vital consequence in the campaign, but helield himself restored to the rank which he most coveted—that of the arbiter of the destinies, and protector of the thrones of sovereigns. So anxious was he for his arrival, that for two days before he came, the troops had been posted to a considerable distance on the road to Prague, expecting his approach. The motives which led to this resolution on the part of Frederick Augustus, were very apparent. Austria, though evidently inclining to the side of the Allies, was not yet prepared to take the field, and a considerable time must clapse before her forces could join those of the Allies; and, meanwhile, Napoléon was in possession of his capital and dominions, and if they were treated as conquered countries, the most frightful miseries awaited his subjects. Influenced by these considerations, and by that regard to rectitude and the obligation of treaties, which is so rare in crowned heads, the King of Saxony, who had for some time been forced to temporize, in expectation of seeing what line Austria was likely to take, and had actually ordered General Thielman, when the first inaccurate accounts of the battle of Lutzen were brought, to shut his gates against the French troops (2), now adopted a decided course, and threw his crown and fortune into hazard with Napoleon. His arrival was preceded by a peremptory order to General Thielman forthwith to surrender the fortress of Torgau to Marshal Ney, who took possession of it on the 15th, and commenced the passage of the river; while the Saxon troops, fourteen thousand strong, including some regiments of excellent cavalry, were anew placed under the orders of Régnier, and formed the seventh corps of the army. General Thielman, whose communications, hy his sovereign's orders, with the Allies had for some time been well known, and who was indignant at the adherence of his sovereign to the oppressor of Germany, and the contradictory orders which, within the last few days, he had received, quitted his colours, and

⁽¹⁾ Odel. i. 72, 74. Fain, i. 382, 384. Viet. et Conq. xxii. 44.

^{(2) &}quot;I have seen, with entire satisfaction, the cooduct you have pursued at Torgau, regarding the conferences proposed to you by the allied generals, as well as before you left Dresden, and it has entirely justified my confidence in you. To allow some pieces of artillery to go out of your walls for the siege of Witteoberg, (then in the hands of the French,) would be altogether contrary to my relations with Austria, which are positively determined,"—King of Saxony to General Thielman, 30th April 1813. Fain, i. 485.

[&]quot;My order, as expressed to you in my letter of the 19th April, is, that the independence of Torgau should be maintained with the utmost eare, and that its gates should be opened to no one without my express order, in concert with the Emperor of Austria. I now add, to prevent ioisunderstanding, that, if the fortune of arms should bring back the French forces to the Elbe, you are to condoct yourself in the same manner; and, as a necessary consequence, that Torgau should not be opened to the French troops."—King or Saxony to General Theleman. 5th May 1813. Fair, i. 486.

entered into the service of the Emperor of Russia. Meanwhile, the king of Saxony was welcomed with extraordinary norm by Aanokon, at Dresden: the Imperial Guards lined the road from the chateau to the city; the cavalry which met him near the camp of Pirna, formed his escort to the gales of the fit I it's In long of the the satisfaction of giving the most decisive provi to Entopy or inclose, · his cantal and throne the first of his

War (4) f Saxony at Dresden was thus a negotiations source of the manual transmission of the advices and intelligence which he brought from Prague, in regard to the intentions of Austria, were of the most disquicting kind. It was no longer doubtthat it a court of Vienna was only temporizing, to gain time to complete dred thousand men, of water times mutually lives. on the Fibe, desiring Narbonne to allude to the intercepted letters.

ample title to desire him to demand his passh pacific relations on, not to commit.

· bons, as they were ., proved that they were any thing rather than forebiten by himself (2).

Two days afterwards, Count Bubna arrived at Dresden from the cabinet of Vienna, and at the same time M de Stadion was dispatched from the same court to the headquarters of the allied Sovereigns at Bautzen, carnestly pressing upon both an accommodation. In this attempt Metternich Mission of at this period was perfectly sincere; for he was seriously alarmed Count Bubna to by the result of the battle of Lutzen, and dreaded nothing so much Dresden: and Stadion to Bautzen, as that Russia and France would accommodate their differences by a treaty on the drum-head, and that Napoléon would be left at liberty to take vengeance at leisure on the German powers which had incurred his displeasure. M. Bubna had several long interviews with Napoléon in the course of which he made the Emperor acquainted with the expectations of his court in regard to the concessions by France, and accession of territory to themselves, which were hoped for. These were, that Austria should have the Illyrian provinces, an increase of territory on the side of Poland, and some also on the Bayarian frontier; and that the confederation of the Rhine should be dissolved. Without committing himself either one way or other in regard to these demands, Napoléon contented himself with declaring that he would agree to an armistice, on condition that the Allies retired behind the Oder, and he himself behind the Elbe, with a view to a congress at Prague, at which England and America should be invited to attend; and M. Bnhna having set out for Vienna with this ultimatum, the Emperor took his departure for his advanced guard in Silesia (1).

Before finally committing his fate to the chances of war, Napoléon Napolton's made the very attempt which Metternich so much dreaded, that of this period. Opening a separate negotiation with one of the allied powers, in the hope of detaching it from the rest. On the day on which Bubna set out for Vienna, he secretly dispatched Caulaincourt to the headquarters of the Emperor of Russia. The object of this mission was to induce the cabinet of St.-Petersburg to accommodate its differences with France, at the expense of Austria; and, well knowing that the great object of its jealousy was the existence, and probable increase, of the grand duely of Warsaw, he proposed to extend the confederation of the Rhine to the Oder; to increase Westphalia by 1,500,000 souls; and to give to Prussia, in exchange for the territory thus lost, the whole grand duchy of Warsaw and the territory of Dantzic, with the exception of the duehy of Oldenburg, by which means she would acquire an increase of between four and five millions of souls, and be restored to the rank she held before the battle of Jena. Her capital was to be Warsaw, and the great advantage held out was, that three hundred leagues, and an independent power, in possession of all the fortresses on the Vistula, would thus be interposed between France and Russia (2). Alexander, however, was proof against these seductions who received Caulaincourt, but in presence of the ministers of England, Austria, and Sweden, as well as of the King of Prussia, and expressed, in their joint name, his anxious wish for the termination of hostilities, but remained firm to his engagements with the Allies, and the cause of European independence. Nothing, however, can paint Napoléon better, or evince more clearly his invariable policy to sacrifice honour, probity, and resentment to present expedience, than the tenor of these proposals. At the very time that he was making so striking a parade in the eyes of Europe, of his firm regard for, and inviolable fidelity to the King ments, by insisting on the radical evil of the existence of the grand duely of Waisaw; and that will naturally lead, after abundance of mystery and diplomatic reserve on both sides, to the propositions which we make, which, on condition of secresy, you are to propose as follows." Then follow the conditions stated in the text.—Narokon's Instructions to Cauraincourt, 18th May 1813. Johnst, iv. 2966.

⁽¹⁾ Count Bubna to Stadion, May 18 1813. Fain, i. 395, 396. Hard. xii. 155, 158. Joun'ry. 289, 292.

⁽²⁾ The preamble to Caulaincourt's instructions bore:—"The Emperor's intention is to negotiate with Russia a peace which may be glorious to her, and which may make Austria pay for her bad faith, and the false policy which she pursued in exasperating France and Russia against each other. The Emperor Alexander will easily rebut these argu-

of Saxony, who had risked his crown in his cause, he was secretly proposing to Busein to doesnot him of all his acquisitions? by tearing from his bron the

that he reached the allied headquarters in Silesla on the 15th May. bringing with him a powerful reinforcement of fourteen thousand veteran soldiers. These, with other Russian detachments which had come un from the rear, amounted in all to twenty-five thousand men; and after deducting the loss at Lutzen, and the subsequent combats, made the army nearly ninety ...

the great reinforcements, under Sacken and Benningson, came up from the Interior of Russia, they had no chance of combating the French with any prospect of success, but by the aid of strong intrenchments. Not only were the Saxon troops, fourteen thousand strong, including three thousand excellent cavalry, now added to Napoleon's army, and their fortresses on the Ellie converted into a secure refuge in case of disaster, but the Wirtemberg contingent, eight thousand good troops, had arrived; the heavy cavalry of Latour Manbourg, the Italian horse of General Fresia, and the second division of the young goard, under Barrols, had also joined the army. Altogether, Napoléon's forces, under his own immediate command, were now raised to a hundred and fifty thousand men, of whom sixteen thousand were admirable cavalry (2). The Allies, therefore, were now overmatched in the proportion of nearly two to one; and it was evident that, whatever the strength of the posttion at Bautzen might he, it was hable to be turned and rendered untenable by an enemy having such superior forces at his command (5).

The Allies had availed themselves of the ten days' respite from of the post active operations, which they had enjoyed since the evacuation of Dresden, to strengthen the position they had selected in a very formidable manner. Their principal stronghold was placed on the famous knolls

(2) "The new arriva"s, with the troops who (3) hiet at Coop and if Precis, Schooll, fee froght at latters, percental a total at the Emperor's in 317. Fam. 1, 277, 377, Jon., iv, 277.

⁽¹⁾ Jam tr 257, 259 Pieta, Gerra, 1913, L. commend of $50 000 combutants "-Fiet et Conf Lacebes lit. 425 Uard sie 159 33H. 45 201 Lucebre hi. 425 Uard no 127 (2) "The new arriva"s, with the troops who

of Klein Bautzen and Kreckwitz, where Frederick the Great found an asylum after his disaster at Hochkirch, and where the strength of his position enabled him to bid defiance to the superior and victorious army of Count Daun. The ground which the allied army now occupied was an uneven surface, in the middle of a country in the hollows of which several small lakes were to be found; while it's eminences terminated for the most part in little monticules or cones, forming so many citadels, where artillery could most advantageously be placed, commanding the whole open country at their feet. The position in this uneven surface, which they had chosen for their battle field, was composed of a series of heights, running from the great frontier chain of Bohemia to the neighbourhood of the little lakes of Malschwitz and the village of Klix, behind which the right was stationed in a situation difficult of access. The Spree ran along the whole front of the position, and it was difficult to approach it in that direction, as well on account of the broken nature of the ground, and the variety of ravines, with streamlets in their bottom, by which it was intersected; as of the number of villages, constituting so many forts, occupied by the Allics, contained within its limits, and the hills planted with cannon, which commanded the whole open country. The principal of these villages were Klein Bautzen, Preititz, Klix, and Kreckwitz. This was the first line of defence; but behind it, at the distance of three miles in the rear, was a second line, strengthened by intrenchments more contracted than the former, and still more capable of a protracted defence. This position, commencing at the village of Hockkirch on the one flank, extended through Bautzen, and the three villages of Baswitz, Inckowitz, and Kubchitz, and then fell back behind the marshy stream of the Kayna, terminated at the heights of Kreckwitz, which overhang the Spree (1).

The first design of Napoléon was to make his principal attack on the left wing of the Allies, which rested on the mountains which and his separate Saxony from Bohemia. After a minute reconnoissance, however, he was diverted from this design, by observing the depth * and intricacy of the wooded ravines and dells which intersected the slope of the mountains in that direction, and which might altogether obstruct the advance of his cavalry and artillery in that quarter. He continued his reconnoitring, therefore, along the whole line, and at eight at night advanced to the village of Klein Wilke, almost within musket-shot of the outposts of the enemy, and then his plan of attack was formed. Orders had some time before been dispatched to Ney, who had passed the Elbc at Torgau with his own corps and that of Victor and Lauriston, to incline to his right, and, instead of moving on Berlin, as originally intended, to cut across the country, and come up so as to form the extreme left of the army in the great battle which was expected near Bautzen. These orders reached Ney on the 17th, and he immediately commenced his cross march, and had already arrived in the neighbourhood of the army on the evening of the 19th. It was on his wing, which was fully sixty thousand strong, that Napoléon relied for his principal, effort, and placed his chief hopes of success, in attacking the enemy's position (2).

Disaster of Bertrand, and halanced own corps, then Victor with the Saxons, in the close of the array. Success on the French left.

Ncy, however, advanced in echelons, Lauriston in front, next his Saxons, in the close of the array. The country through which his march lay, when he approached Bautzen, was in great part covered with woods; and this led to a

⁽¹⁾ Fain. i. 403, 404. Odel. i. 86. Jom. iv, 300.

Precis, Schoell, ii. 320, 321.

(2) Jom. iv. 301, 302. Fain, i. 412, 413. Vict, et Conq. xxii, 46, 47, very serious check being experienced in that quarter. To open up the communication with Ney, Napoleon detached Bertrand's corps towards the left, which soon got involved in the woods in which the Marshal was already en-ni loose order after dinner, without any proper look-out, in a wood near Kongswartha, were surprised and totally routed by Briely de Tolly, with the loss of two thousand prisoners and eleven pieces of cannon. The whole division dispersed, and it was only by taking refuge in the neighbourning nentral territory of Bohemia that the great bulk of them, above twenty thousand strong, escaped During the action, the village of kongswarthat took fire, and was reduced to astes. D'Nork at the same time encountered the whole corps of Lauriston near Weissig, and being unexpectedly assailed by superior forces, he was unable to keep his ground, though his troops fought with the most determined bravery, he was worsted with the loss of above two thousand men, so that success and disaster were nearly balanced on the left of the army (4)

n in botto. The main position on which the Allies intended to give battle, and five intended in the strength of which they relied to counterbalance the hast between mumerical superiority of the enemy, was the second line from the first line along the banks of the Spree without a struggle, yet tills was only with a view to take off the first edge of the enemy's attack by resistance there, and it was in this concentrated position in the rear, which was strongly fortified by redoubts, that the real-stand was to be made. The filled army, but yet for this purpose, was a good deal scattered over the ground on which it was to combat, and on the morning of the 50th occupied the following positions.—On the left, Berg and D'York were stationed from Jenkowitz to Barchutz, with ten thousand Prussyans. The plain from thence to kreek-witz was not occupied by any plaintry in the first line, it was thought to be extent. Bluelier's infinity, about eighteen thousand strong, extended from 'Arcekwitz to Pliskowitz, and further on, beyond the little lakes, Barelay was stationed with fourteen thousand Russians near Gleint. Mibradowitch, with ten thousand Russians, was placed in front of the whole, in Bantzen and its environs, with blest and five thousand Prussians near him on the lie, his of Berg. The second line consisted of the Russian Guards and reserve, sixteen thousand strong, who were about a mile in the rear behind the left and curtre, and near them were the magnificent Russian rurrassiers, eight thousand in number, who seemed more than a match for any French horse which could be brought against them (2) research The whole his of the Alhes, while! thus formed a sort of semitive first price, convex to the outside, was somewhat above two league. In which its left rested, required to I c in part occupied liself, which rendered it necessary to extend the him above half a league further in that direction he could see over the wholo field of battle, direct the movements of the troops, and enjoy the splendid spectacle which presented fitelf. And never in truth had war appeared in a more imposing form, nor had the astonishing amount of the forces at the disposal of the French emperor ever been more conspicuous. On all sides, the troops, preceded by their artillery, which kept up an incessant fire on the banks of the river, advanced rapidly towards tho stream: at first the plan seemed covered with a confused multitude of hores, cannon, chariots and men, stretching as far as the eye could reach, impres-for a scrious resistance had been made. Generally speaking, therefore, the passage was effected without much opposition: Bautzen, belog no longer tenable as an isolated advanced post in the midst of the enemy, was evacuated by the Allies, who withdrew the troops that occupied it to the other side of the river, and taken possession of by Macdonald, who immediately caused his men to defile over its arch over the Spree; while Marmont threw four bindges across below the town, over which his whole corps was speedly transported, and Oudinot crossed without difficulty near Grubschutz, and immediately began to advance towards the heights at the foot of the Obbomian mountains, on which the left of the Allies was posted. By five o'clock in the ofternoon, the river was passed of all points, and the troops were right, however, the action soon became extremely warm : Oudinot there pressed with indefatigable octivity up the hills which form the Robemian frontier, and which rose like an amplitheatre to bound the field of battle in that direction. The oscending line of the smoke, and flashes of the artillery among the overhancing woods, soon showed the progress he was making while the Roheman echoes rolled back the roar of the artillery, and the glancing of the musketry was to be seen through the shadows of the woods, now darkened by the approaching night. Prince Wirtemberg, however, and St.-Priest's divisions of Milaradowitch's corps, maintained themselves with luvineible resolution in these woody fastnesses; and when the Emperor Alexander, who commanded the Russians in person, saw that they were obliged to fall back, and were beginning to be overmatched, he reinforced them by three brigades of infantry and one of cavalry, under General Diebitch, which restored the combat in that quarter, and the itussians maintained themselves for the night in the villages of Preilitz, Mehlthener, and Falkenberg, still keeping possession of the erest and commanding points of

Solution with this obstinate conflict was going on among the hills on the perial should left, a still more serious attack was made on Kleist's Prutsians on the heights of Burg, and the renameder of Milaradowitch's corps, under himself in person, on the embrances in rear of Bautzen, to which the

the mountains, while the French were far advanced in the valteys which furrowed their sides (2).

Russians had retired after the evacuation of that town. At noon, General Milaradowitch was violently assailed by Campans' division, followed by the whole of Marmont's corps, while Bonnet advanced towards Nieder Kayna, and commenced an attack on Kleist. The resistance, however, was as obstinate as the attack; and Napoleon, deeming it essential to his plan to make a great impression in that quarter, in order to withdraw attention from the grand inovement he was preparing on his left, brought forward the whole of Bertrand's corps, still, notwithstanding its losses, above twenty-four thousand strong, with Latour Maubourg's formidable cuirassiers, to support Marmont and Macdonald. Allove fifty thousand combatants were thus accumulated in the centre, supported by a powerful artillery; and the Allies, being not more than half the number at that point, were constrained to retire. This was done, however, in the finest order; the troops halting and facing about, by alternate companies, to fire, as they slowly withdrew towards the intrenched camp, their artillery keeping up an incessant discharge on the pursning columns. The French centre, meanwhile, steadily advanced, and, as soon as they reached it, assaulted Kleist's troops on the heights of Burg with great gallantry. Despite all their efforts, however, the brave Prussians maintained their ground with undannted resolution: their young ranks were thinned, but quailed not beneath the enemy's fire; and, seeing that they could not carry the position by an attack in front, the assailants attacked the village of Nieder Gurkan on its right, in order to threaten it in flank. Here, however, they experienced so vigorous a resistance from Rudiger's men of Blucher's corps, some regiments of which had been detached, under Ziethen, to occurry that important post; and the fire from Blueher's guns, on his commanding heights immediately behind, was so violent; that, after sustaining immense losses, they were obliged to desist from the attempt; and it was not till seven at night, that, by bringing up the eelebrated 10th regiment of light infantry to the charge, the village was at length earried. Then the whole allied centre slowly retired over the plateau of Nadelwitz, to their intrenelied camp in the rear (1); but Blucher still retained his advanced position on the heights of kreckwitz, from the summit of which his artillery never ceased to thunder, as from a fiery volcano, in all directions, till utter darkness drew a veil over the field of battle.

By the Emperor's orders, the French troops bivouacked in squares the test on the ground they had won with so much difficulty; but, though the Spree was passed at all points, and the right and centre considerably advanced over the ground occupied in the morning by the enemy, yet the enormous losses they had sustained proved the desperate nature of the conflict in which they were engaged, and inspired the troops with melancholy presages as to the issue of the battle on the morrow. Kleist and Ziethen's Prussians in particular, though in great part young troops, who had seen fire for the first time that day, had evinced the most heroic bravery; no ground had been won from them but by the force of overwhelming numbers, and above ten thousand French or Italians lay weltering in their blood, around the heights, from which the Prussians had drawn off every gnn, every chariot, every wounded man. Napoléon, however, who was aware where the decisive blow was to be struck, was little concerned for the frightful carnage in his centre; his object had been gained by ground having been won, and the encrry compelled to concentrate their forces in that quarter; and the sound of distant caunon on his extreme left, as well as the light of burning villages, d, Irona is rider'l, il. 324, 525. Vert et Cong. anti, 49, 50. Palm, i. 497, 468. Remler, 272, 573.

which illuminated that quarter of the heavens, told how soon Ney would be in action in that direction In effect, that marshal had crossed the Spree, near hirs, and though Barelay, de Tolly still held that village, and lay in strength betwirt it and hlatschwitz, jet, he was entirely ignorant of the strength of the enemy to whom he was soon to be opposed, and altogether unequal to the task of preventing the right of the Allies from being turned by the immense masses by whom he was surrounded on the following day. Aspoldon, therefore, highly satisfied with the result of the first day's engagement, retired for the night to Bautren, having first dispatched orders to Outlinto, to renew the combat by daybteak, on the following morning, among the hills on the right, in order to fir the enemy's attention on that part of the, line, and prevent any adequate succour being sent to aver the tremendous stroke he was to deliver on his left (f).

By five o'clock on the morning of the 21st, the fire began with unwearied vizour in the wooded recesses of the Bohemian bilts, and the flag the echoes rang even to the summit of the kunewald. The Emneror Alexander, however, had sent such considerable reinforcements during the night to that quarter, that Milaradowitch was enabled not only to repulse the attacks on his position on the heights of Meblthener, but to drive the enemy back to a considerable distance beyond Binowitz Napobeen, alarmed at this unexpected turn of events on that side, immediately ordered up Macdonald's corps to the support of Dudinot, and at the same timo immenso masses, above forty thousand strong, were deployed in the centre. In front of Bautzen, to arrest the attention of the enemy, but still out of cannon-shot, as it was not his intention to expose his troops to the murderous fire of the allied artillery on the heights of breckwitz, from which they had suffered so much on the preceding day. Before Macdonald, however, could get up to his assistance. Oudinot was so hard pressed that he was unable to maintain his ground, step by step the Russian tirailleurs gained upon the Bayarian sharpshooters in the woods (2); and at length he was fairly driven out of the hills, and forced to assume a defensive position in the plain at their feet, where the arrival of Macdonald enabled him to stop the progress of the enemy.

Proposed Though much disconcerted by this ill success on his right, Napote build from ass only desirous to gain time, and maintain his ground in of Ney on would be ground and fully better served, maintained its superiority, and rendered any attack by the masses of infantry in that quarter too perflows to be attempted Meanwhile, the Limperor Instened amounds for the sound of Ney's camon on the extreme left, as that was the signal for which he waited to order a general attack in the centre to favour that decisive operation. In effect, that marshal, at the head of his own corps and those of Lauriston, had early in the morning advanced against the position of Darchy, near telena, while Victor's corps and Reguler's Saxons were directed, by a water circuit, to turn his extreme right by the wood and heights of Darchy, enter the entirely pause and vacillate in the midst of his important advance until his reserves came up, and Victor and Regnier had arrived abreast of his men; whereby the allied sovereigns had time to take the proper measures to ward off the danger, by sending every disposable man and gun in that direction, where they had never hitherto apprehended any serious attack, and preparing for a general retreat. It was not till one o'clock in the afternoon, that Ney deemed himself in sufficient strength to resume the offensive; and by that time the season of decisive success bad passed away; the chausée through lockhirch, in the rear of the whole allied army, could no longer be gained, and the victory at best would be barren of results (1). *

⁽¹⁾ Namber 4"2 214 3 m is 20 2a n, 1, 407, fr Ranger 2"2 217 Old I 81 92 Preticis (0) Old I 90 bet et lorg ann 42, 32 Schoolt, II 277, 273 Vet et Cong antic bie

and the victory at best would be barren of results (1). Napoléon, however, made a vigorous effort, by a combined atlack role non on the centre and left of the enemy, to effect a total overthrow. Seeing the allied centre in some degree bared of troops by the powerful succours which had been sent to the right, he ordered Soult to make a general attack with the four corps under his command in the centre; while, at the same time, the terrible artillery of the guord was brought up to reply to the enemy's batteries on the heights of Kreckwitz. These orders were promptly obeyed. Marmont, Mortler, Bertrand, and Latour Maubourg, put themselves at the head of their respective corps of cavalry and infaniry; while the Imperial Guard, in deep array, advanced in their rear to, support the altack. Lighty thousand men, in admirable order, moved ogainst the redoubtable heights, the guns from which had so long carried death through the I'rench ranks; while a hundred pieces of cannon, disposed on the highest points of the ground which they traversed, kept up a vehement fire on the enemy's batteries. This grand attack soon changed the fortune of the day. Blucher, now assailed in front by Marmont, in flank by Bertrand, and in rear by Ney, was soon obliged to recall Kleist and the other reinforcements which he had sent to the assistance of Barclay de Tolly; and in consequence, Ney, whose reserves had at length come up, was enabled not only to retake Preilitz without difficulty, but to spread out his light troops over the whole level ground as far as Wurschen. The allied right was thus entirely turned : and any odvantage which Blucher and Barcloy de Tolly might gain, would only increase the danger of their position, by drawing them on towards the Spree, while a superlor force of the enemy was interposed between them and the main body of their army (2). The titles In these critical circumstances the allied sovereigns resolved to Petreat. They might, indeed, by bringing up the reserves, and the Bussian and Prussian guards, have without difficulty regained the ground they had lost on the right, and again advanced their standards to the Spree; but as long as Lauriston and Regaler were in their rear, such success would only have augmented their ultimate dancer; just as a similar success on the left of the British at Waterloo would have enhanced the perils of Napolčon's position, when Blucher, with sixty thousand Prussians, was menacing the chaussée of La Belle Alhance. It had, from the outset of the compaign, also been part of their fixed policy, never to place themselves Indinger of undergoing a total defeat, but to take advantage of their numerous exaltry to cover their retreat, whenever the Issue of an action seemed doubtful; being well aware that the superiority of their physical resources and moral energy would thus in the end, experially if the accession of Austria were obtained (5), secure

^{(1) (1311, 1 92, 93} Proc. in Stor., la. 232 372 Jan iv 304 307 List et lang sa. 31 22. (2) Jan, is 305, 309 Old i $2,03 lam, 1

^{$28,415} Kinder,242 411 Ye et Comp stin. 37 32

⁽³ Trecula Chart, 11 35 Jun 14 30) 30% (4) 1 1.93 91 Vallet Long 2211 322.33

to them the victory. Orders were given, therefore, to both Barclay and Blucher to retreat; and the whole allied army, arrayed in two massy columns, began to retire; the Russians by the road of Hochkirch and Lobau, the Prussians by Wurschen and Weissenberg.

Then was seen in its highest histre the admirable arrangements when the of modern discipline, and the noble feelings with which both armics were animated. Seated on the summit of the Hohenherg, near Neider Kayna, from whence he could survey a great part of the field of battle, Napoleon calmly directed the movements of his army; and the mighty host which he commanded, now roused to the highest pitch, and moving on in perfect array, pressed at all points upon the retiring columns of the enemy. It was at once a sublime and animating spectacle, when, at the voice of this mighty wizard, a hundred and fifty thousand men, spread over a line of three leagues in length, from the Bohemian mountains on the right to the forest of Baruth on the left, suddenly started, as it were, into life, and moved majestically forward, like a mighty wave, bearing the light and smoke of the guns as sparkling foam on its erest: The greater part of this vast immdation poured into the valley of Neider Kayna in the centre, and the declining sun glanced on the forests of bayonets, and the dazzling lines of helmets, sahres, and cnirasses, with which the level space at its hottom was filled; while the heights of Kreckwitz, yet in the hands of the enemy, thundered forth a still increasing fire on all sides, like a volcano encircled by flame. Soon the receding line of fire, and the light of the burning villages, told that the consuming torrent was rapidly advancing through the valley; and at length the cannonade ceased on the summits of Kreckwitz; and Blucher's columns, dark and massy, were seen slowly wending their way to the rear. In vain, however, the French cuirassiers, eight thousand strong, were now hurried to the front, and endeavoured by repeated charges to throw the enemy into confusion, so as to convert the retreat into a flight; the Russian cavalry was too powerful, the allied array too perfect, to permit any advantage being gained. A lundred and twenty French guns preceded the line of the pursuers, and thundered on the retiring columns of the enemy; but the Russian and Prussian artillery were equally powerful, and taking advantage of the numerous eminences which the line of retreat afforded, played with destructive effect on the advancing masses; while their numerous and magnificent cavalry repulsed every attempt to charge which the French horsemen made. Gradually the fire became less violent as the Allies receded from the field; the intrenched position was abandoned on all sides; and at length the cannonade entirely ceased, and night drew her veil over that field of carnage and of glory (1).

Napoleon's Papoleon's tent was pitched for the night near the inn of Kleina monument Burchwitz, in the middle of the squares of his faithful guard; while condition Ney established himself at Wursehen, where the allied sovereigns had had their headquarters the night before. It was from the former place that the Emperor dietated the bulletin of the battle, as well as the following decree, which all lovers of the arts, as well as admirers of patriotic virtue, must regret was prevented, by his fall, from being carried into execution:—"A monument shall he erected on Mont-Cénis; on the most conspicuous face the following inscription shall be written—'The Emperor Napoléon, from the field of Wursehen, has ordered the erection of this monument, in testimony of his gratitude to the people of France and ⁽¹⁾ Fain, i. 415, 417. Kausler, 882, 883. Odel. i. 94, 95. Précis in Schoell, ii. 332, 333. Jom. iv, 309, 310. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 53, 54.

Italy. This monument will transmit from age to age the remembrance of that great epoch, when, in the space of three months, twelve hundred thousand men flen to arms to protect the miserant of the French empre(f)"

The Emperor Alexander commanded the allied armies in person conduct of at Bautzen, the ill success at Lutzen having weakened the conconduct or vor Alexan- fidence of the soldiers in Wittgenstein, and the realousies of the the battle generals rendering the appointment of any inferior officer a matter of great difficulty. With the king of Prussia by his side, he took the entire . direction of the movements, and displayed a judgment in council, and coolness in danger, which excited universal admiration. It was with difficulty that the entreaties of those around him could prevent him from advancing too far into the fire for the duties of a commander-in-chief, as it was, he incurred the greatest danger, and near Bautzen parrowly escaped falling into the hands of the enemy. The conduct of the retreat, in the face of the immense force which thundered in pursuit, was a model of skill and judgment. every eminence, every enclosure, every stream, which offered an opportunity of arresting the enemy, was taken advantage of with admirable ability, and such were the losses which the French sustained in pressing on the unconquerable rearguard, that, at daybreak on the following morning, the Russians still held the heights of Weissenberg, within cannon-shot of the field of battle (2)

Losset on The loss of the French in the battle of Bautzen was considerably

order with which the retreat was conducted. The Affics fost in the two days $10,000 men killed and wounded, and the French took $4.00 prisoners, most of them wounded, but neither cannon nor artiller; graced their trimingly, and their own loss was fully $19,000 killed and wounded on the field alone, independent of those on the previous day, insomatch that $20,000 wounded were lodged, two days after the battle, at Bautren, and the villages in its environs, while $5000 were killed outright on the field of battle $(5)$. A great number of the wounded were slightly hurt only in the hands and feet—an ominious circumstance which had been observed also in the eampaign of $1800 on the Danube, and bespoke the anxiety of the con-cripts to escape from these secues of carnate. The Saxon peasants displayed unbounded and ind a report 0 e Emperor doesned. If predent to acquire melos Sumers on the Casha Stores, Ta-110, 1724 and Lusar, re 173-175. Fut General Washers I come who has great numbers of the worm of all resum has recented at reation on the common of the stores of the common of the balance of the system of the term rest to more of the wor sleet lust it fairly the great re part Sunang somes per who had recently for soil to some kindness to these unhappy sufferers; without regard to side, nation, or language, they received them into their cottages, and did all in their power to mitigate their distresses; and, not contented with waiting till the sufferers were brought into their dwellings, themselves issued forth to seek them on the field. On all sides were to be seen men, women, and children, earrying litters, pushing wheelbarrows, or drawing little earts, laden with wounded men; Russians were laid beside French, Prussians beside Italians; the women tended the dying, and bandaged the wounds alike of friend and foe: all the animosity of the contest was forgotten; and at the close of one of the bloodiest battles recorded in modern times, was to be seen the glorious spectacle of Christian charity healing the wounds and assuaging the sufferings equally of the victors and the vanquished (1).

By daybreak on the following morning, the French army was in motion, and Napoléon, who had hardly allowed himself any rest during the night, in person directed their movements. They soon came up with the rearguard of the enemy, who had marched all night, and now stood firm on the heights behind Reichenbach, in order to gain time for the immense files of chariots, cannon, and wounded men to defile by the roads in their rear. Milaradowitch had the command; and the veterans of the Moscow campaign were prepared to defend the position to the last extremity; while forty pieces of cannon were admirably placed on the summit, and a large body of cuirassicrs on the slopes seemed intentionally situated for an opportunity to come to blows with the horsemen of the French. Struck with the strength of this position, as well as the determined countenance of the allied force which occupied it, Napoléon paused, and engaged only in a cannonade till the cavalry of the Guard came up. Reichenbach itself, in front of the allied position, occupied by the Russian light troops, was only abandoned after an obstinate conflict; and when the French columns showed themselves on the opposite side, they were torn in pieces by the point-blank discharge of the enemy's batteries from the heights behind. The Russian general sent some of his regiments of eavalry into the plain, where they were immediately charged by the red lancers of the French guard; but the latter were defeated with eonsiderable loss. Napoléon upon this brought up Latour Maubourg, with the whole eavalry of the Guard, six thousand strong, and at the same-time made dispositions for outflanking and turning the enemy. These measures were attended with the desired effect, and after several brilliant charges on both sides, the Allies retired to Gorlitz, but in the best order. Enraged at seeing his enemy thus escaping, Napoleon hastened to the advanced posts, and himself pressed on the movements of the troops insomuch that the rays of the setting sun gleamed on the sabres and bayonets of fifty thousand men, accumulated in a front of a mile and a half in breadth, and elosely advancing in pursuit. But it was all in vain. The enemy, proud of the resistance they had made against suell superior numbers, retired in admirable order, without leaving any thing behind; guns, wounded, caissons, were alike eonveyed away, and all the genius of the Emperor, which never shone forth with brighter lustre in directing the movements, could not extract one trophy from their rearguard. Napoleon could not conceal his vexation at beholding the unbroken array of the allied troops thus eluding his grasp, and the skill with which they availed themselves of every eminence to plant their guns and arrest his progress. "What!" said he, "after such a butchery, no

⁽¹⁾ Précis in Schoell, ii. 334. Fain, 96, 97. Odel. i. 96, Lond. 49. Kausler, 884.

The halls at this moment were fixing thick around him, and one of the Emperor's escort fell dead at his feet, "Duroe," said be. turning to the grand marshal, who was by his side, "fortune is resolved to have one of us to-day" Some of his suite observed with a shudder, in an -- the arm areas of the hards of Peel are and the under breath, that it death of Lannes (2) lized. The enemy r dorf, and Napolcon, who was anxious to push on before night to Gorlitz. lumself hurried to the front, to urge on the froms who were to dislodge them from the ground which they had occupied to har the approach to it. llis suite followed him, four o-breast, at a rapid trot through a hollow way. in a cloud of dust that hardly one of the riders could see his right-hand man Suddenly a cannon-ball glanced from a tree near the Emperor, and struck a file beland, consisting of Mortier, Caulaincourt, hirgener, and Duroc In the confusion and dust, it was not at first perceived who was hurt; but o page soon arrived and whisnered in his ear, that hirgener was killed, and Duroc desperately wounded. Larrey and Ivan instantly came up, but all their efforts were unavailing. Duroe's entrails were torn out, and the dying man was carried into o cottage near Makersdorf, Napoléon, profoundly affected, dismounted, and gazed long on the battery from whence the fatal shot had issued. he then entered the collage, and ascertained, with tears in his eyes, that there was no hope "Duroc," said he, pressing the hand of the dying hero, "there is another world, where we shall meet again!" Hemorable words, wrung by anguish even from the child of insidelity and the Revolution ! Finally, when It was announced some hours afterwards that all was over, he mit into the hands of Berthier, without articulating a word, a paper, ordering the construction of a monument on the spot where he fell, with this inscription ,-"Hero the General Boroe, Dake of I rink, grand marshal of the palace of the Emperor Napoleon, gloriously fell, struck by a cannon-ball, and died in the arms of the Emperor, his friend (5)."

100 results? no prisoners? Those fellows there will not leave us a noil: they use from their ashes. When will this be done (1)."

Napoléon pitched his tent in the neighbourhood of the cottage Marrafal sat, wrapped in his grey great-coat, with his forehead resting on his hands, and his elbows on his knees, a prey to the most agonizing reflections. In vain Caultincourt and Maret at 1 --- at 11 att at an ja it ag art mange sing orders "To-morron --

Danis of

ror, as he again resumed 1 s reigned around, the groups of officers at a little distance hardly articulated above their breath; gloom and depression appeared in every countenance, while the subdued hum of the soldiers preparing their repast, and the sullen murinur of the artillery waggens as they rolled in the distance, alone told that a mighty host was assembled in the neighbourhood. Slowly the moon rose over this melancholy scepe; the heavens became illuminated by the flames of the adjoining villages, which had fallen a prey to the beense of the soldiers; while the noble bands of the Imperial guard played alternately triumphal and elegiac strains, in the vain hope of distracting the grief of their chief. Could the genius of painting portray the scene, could the soul of poetry be inspired by the feelings which all around experienced, a more striking image could not be presented of the mingled woes and animation of war, of the greatness and weakness of man, of his highest glories, and yet nothingness against the arm of his Creator (1)."

⁽² date vol 471, 172 (3 Sour de Lauf & 272 179 (5) § 1 100 101 (1) $4 m, 1 411 415 O' L. 1 87 150 Tamb Vet et Com ta i 51 $5 8 mit de Conta un court L 111

The loss of Duroc, Kirgener, and General Bruyères, who also fell dency of the on the same day, as well as the firm countenance and admirable array of the Allies, who retired after a bloody battle, in which they had been worsted, without the loss of cannon or prisoners in the pursuit, and with no considerable diminution of baggage, occasioned the most gloomy presentiments in the French army. It was plain that the days of Austerlitz and Jena were past: a great victory had been gained without any result; and the victors, in the pursuit, had sustained both a greater and more serious loss than the vanquished. Little hopes remained of subduing an enemy who thus rose up with renewed vigour from every disaster: with truth might Napoléon have said with Pyrrhus-" Another such victory, and I am undone." Murmurs, regrets, expressions of despair, were heard even among the most resolute; the flames, which rose on all sides as the villages were taken possession of, at once bespoke the obstinacy of the resistance, and the determination of the inhabitants; and even the bravest sometimes exclaimed, on beholding the universal spirit with which the people were animated, "What a war! we shall all leave our remains here." Napoléon was no stranger to the feelings of despondency which were so common even around his headquarters, and he gave vent to his spleen by cutting sarcasms against his principal officers. "I see well, gentlemen," said he, "that you are no longer inclined to make war: Berthier would rather follow the chace at Grosbois: Rapp sighs after his beautiful hotel at Paris. I understand you; I am no stranger to the pleasures of the capital (2)."

On the 23d, the allied army continued to retreat, still in two cothe Allies lumns, after, having broken down the bridges over the Neisse: the ton ards right column moved upon Waldau, the left upon Lobau. At nine o'clock, the Saxon advanced posts appeared before Gorlitz, and, finding the bridge broken down, after some delay and warm skirmishing, forced the passage of the river, and by hastily erecting five new bridges, soon crossed over so large a force as rendered the town no longer tenable by the Allies. The Emperor arrived at Gorlitz a few hours after, and rested there the remainder of that and the whole of the next day, shut up with Canlaincourt in his cabinet, and constantly occupied with diplomatic arrangements. Meanwhile, the Allies continued their retreat, and the French pressed the pursuit in three columns: the right skirting the Bohemian mountains, and following Wittgenstein; the centre following Blucher and Barclay de Tolly on the great road to Leignitz; the left marching upon Glogau, the garrison of which, now blockaded for above three months, anxiously expected their deliverance. Although no attempt was made to defend any positions, yet the French cavalry frequently came up with that of the Allies, and some sharp encounters took de Caul. i. 177, 179.

⁽¹⁾ Odel. i. 101. 103. Fain, i. 427, 429. Souv.

Napoleon at the time, to testify his regard for Duroc, consigned two hundred napoleons in the hands of the owner of the house, jointly with the clergyman of the parish, for the purpose of creeting a monument to his memory. The monument, however, was never erected; and by an order of the Russian ctat-major, dated 1st April 1814, the money was reclaimed by the Allies, and not applied to its destined purpose - an unworthy proceeding - forming a striking contrast to the noble conduct of the Archduke Charles, in 1706, regarding the French tomb of General Marceau —See Order of Baron Rosen, 1st April 1814, in Fair, i, 430, and Ante,

⁽²⁾ Rapp. Mém. 166. Fain, i. 433. Odel. i. 107.

place between the horse on both sides; but the dragoons of Napoléon, for the most part cased in curasses, or heavily armed, were no match in this desultor warfare for the nimble children of the desert; and the pursuers suffered more under the lances of the Cossacks, than the retreating cavalry did from the French sabres (1)

combined No attempt was made by the Albes to defend the passage of the telegrative Que.sse, the Bober, or the katsbach, although their rocky banks. and deeply furrowed rayings offered every facility for retarding the advance of the enemy. The Emperor Alexander was making for an iotrenched camp prepared near Schweidnitz, and was desirous of avoiding any serious encounter till it was reached. On the 96th, however, an Opportunity occurred of striking a considerable blow, near Hainau, upon the advanced column of Lauriston's corps. After the troops under Maison had passed that town, and were traversing the valley of the Theisse without having explored the surrounding Leights, a signal was suddenly given by setting fire to a windfull, and before the French had time to form square, the enemy's cavalry, consisting of three strong Prussian regiments, were upon them, The Preoch dragoons, who were at the head of the column, instantly fled back to Hainau, leaving the infantry to their fate. They were speedily broken, and the whole artillers of the column, consisting of eighteen pieces, taken, with four hundred men made prisoners, besides an equal number killed and wounded, although from the want of horses only thelve of the guns could be brought off This offair, which cost the life of Colonel Bolfs, the Prussian commander, who gloriously fell in the midst of the enemy's squares, would have been still more decisive but for the uncontrollable impatience of the Prussian dragoons, whose ardour made them break into a chargo before the proper moment had arrived; as it was, however, it was one of the most brilliant eavairs actions which occurred during the war, and may justly be placed beside the splendid charge of the heavy German dragoons on the French infantry, on the 25d of July in the preceding year, the day after the battle of Salamanea (2)

Napolion was severely mortified by this check, not so much from be stiged the amount of the loss he had sustained, which, in such a host, to leigni a n . . 1 . . and unbroken array of the amed forces, but we are ever, his arms had their revenge General Schastiani, at the head of the cavaley of Victor's corns, which was advancing by forced marches towards Glogan to relieve the garrisons, fell in near Sprottin with a Russian convoy, which was moving, unaware of the victory that had been gained, up to the main army, and captured the whole, consisting of twenty-two pieces and sixty tumbrils, wi . . bed and in other quarters, however, from being of the enemy, the Albes were better on - 1 , Bussian cavalry, on the same day, attacked, near Gottesberg, theire squadrons of Aspoleon's culrassiers, and defeated them, with the loss of four hundred prisoners; a partizon corps captured a considerable park of artillery, while Woronzoff's cavalry fell in with a large body of the enemy's cavalry near Dessau, on the I the, but them to the rout, and reade five hundred prisoners. Meanwhile, the main body of the Albes retired without further molestation by Leignitz to the neighbourhood of Schweidnitz, where the intrenched camp had been constructed, and where it was intended that a stand should be made (1).

These partial successes, however, determined nothing; and the dured the progress of the French arms, as well as the position of their forces, had now become such as to excite just disquietude in the breasts of the allied sovereigns. The great line of communication with Poland and the Vistula was abandoned; the blockading force before Glogau withdrew on the approach of the enemy; and the garrison, which had nearly exhausted its means of subsistence, was relieved, amidst transports of joy on both sides, on the 29th. All the allied forces were concentrated in the neighbourhood of Schweidnitz, or between Leignitz and that place; and although the intrenched camp, resting on the former fortress, was of great strength, yet it could not be disguised that it was close to the foot of the Bohemian mountains; and that if Austria, in reliance on whose ultimate co-operation this direction had been given to the allied forces, should prove unfaithful to the cause of Europe, they would find it next to impossible to regain their communication with the Oder and the Vistula. Great reinforcements, indeed, were on their march from Russia-full fifty thousand effective menand an equal force was in progress in Prussia; but some weeks, at the least. . must clapse before the most forward of them could reach the allied headquarters; and if the diverging march to the extremity of Upper Silesia were much longer to be pursued, the French might interpose between the allied main army and the succours on which they relied. The Russians, by the morning state on 27th May; were only thirty-five, the Prussians twenty-five thousand effective soldiers: ill success and retreat had produced its usual effect in diminishing the number of available men, and the abandonment of the line of communication with Poland, had occasioned great difficulty in turning aside the convoys from the road they were pursuing, one of which, as before mentioned, actually had already fallen into the enemy's hands (2).

With reason, therefore, Napoléon regarded the present state of Napoléon at affairs as highly auspicious to his arms, and the soldiers participated in his satisfaction from the ample supplies of every thing which they obtained in the rich agricultural districts of Upper Silesia; exhibiting a marked contrast to the extreme penury, almost amounting to famine, which they had experienced in the wasted fields of Saxony and Lusatia. Delivered by these favourable circumstances from the melancholy forchodings which the death of Duroc, and the imperfect success at Bautzen had occasioned, the Emperor recovered all his former screnity of mind : he was constantly with the advanced posts, and directed their movements with extraordinary precision; while the gaiety of his manner, which appeared in the multitude of the questions which he asked, and the French and Italian songs which he hummed as he rode along, bespoke the hopes with which he was inspired as to the issue of the campaign. A gleam of sunshine shone for a brief period upon his career, and recalled, midway between the disasters of Moscow and the overthrow of Leipsic, the triumphs of his earlier years. Again, as in former days, the allied armies were recoiling before his arms; province after province was overrun by his followers; and already one-half of the prophecy which he had uttered to the Abbé de Pradt at Warsaw had been accomplished (5):-" Success will render the Russians bold: I am going,

⁽¹⁾ Lond. 52, 53. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 56, 57, Odel. i. 112, 11. Fain, i. 440.

(2) Lond. 55, 56. Odel. i. 109, 110. St. Cyr, Hist. Mil. iv. 50, 51.

(3) Ante, viii. 420.

to raise three hundred thousand mon I will deliver two bittles between the Elbe and the Oder, and in six months I shall be on the Meinen (1)

Although, however, appearances were thus favourable at headquarters, and in the grand army under the immediate command of veribeless. vermeres Nanoleon, vet this was far from being the case universally, and to les een many circumstances, both in his military and political situation, were calculated to awaken the most serious apprehensions. Though his infantry and artiflers were in great strength, and had for the most part surpassed his expectations, the cavalry of the grand army was still extremely deficient, and this want both rendered it impossible to obtain decisive suceess in the field, and, even if an advantage was there obtained, made any attempt to follow it up more hazardous to the victorious than the vanoushed party. This weakness was the more sensibly felt by Napoleon, that he had in his previous campaigns made such constant and successful use of this arm. and that the vehemence and rapidity of his operations sayoured rather of the fierce sweep of Asiatic conquest, than the slow and methodical operations of Luropean warfare. The same cause had exposed him to great inconveniences in his rear, where the albed partizans had in many places crossed the Fibe. and carried the enthusiasm of their preclamations, and the terror of their arms, far into the Westphalian plains. But, most of all, he had reason to apprehend the armed me hation of Austria Facts more convincing than words here spoke with decisive authority as to the thunderbolt which might erclong be expected to issue from the dark cloud that overhung the Bohemian mountains. The forces which the cabinet of Vienna had already accumulated on that frontier range, little short of a hundred thousand men, enabled its ambassador. Count Stadion, who was still at the allied headquarters. to speak almost with the tone of command to the beligerent powers, while the direction which the alfred armies had now taken upon Leignitz. Schweidmiz, and Unior Silesia, to the entire abandonment of their great line of communication with Poland, and their own resources, seemed to leave no doubt of a secret understanding with the Austrian government, and an intention to a base their future operations on the great natural fortress of Bohemia (2) lame at The accounts from the rear at this period were of so alarming a the accounts from the formation that it is not surprising they exercised a predominant the freeth influence on the mind of the Emperor , the more especially as the recent experience of the Moscow campaign had vividly impressed on his mind the dangers of a general interruption of his communications in that direction General Bitlow, who had the command of the forces around Berlin, and in front of Mazdeburg, being relieved of all apprehensions for the capital. by the direction of Ney's corps to Silesia, had pushed his partizan hodies in all directions, and kept the enemy in continual apprehension for his detached parties and communications. Independent of the brilliant success of Woronzoff's catalry near De sau, which has been already mentioned (5), beneral /astroff, who commanded the Prosslan landwebt, had made the greatest exertions, and not only afforded the most efficient aid to the desultors war fare beyond the 1 lbe, but prepared a large body of men ready to join the allied army in regular battl. Ceneral Chernlehelf left the Lower Libe, and bring learned, while lying between Magdeburg and the Havel, that the Westphalian general Ochs was at Halberstadt, on the left lank of the I lbc, with a convoy of artiflery, he resolved to surprise him I taying forthwith crossed the river with his indefatigable linssars and Gossacks, on the evening of the 29th May, he marched all day and night, and at five on the following morning reached the enemy, thirteen German, or nearly fifty English miles distant. The surprise was complete; and, although a desperate resistance was made, it terminated in the capture or destruction of the whole enemy's detachment, twelve hundred strong, with fourteen pieces of cannon. The ammunition waggons were all blown up by the French, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. Nor was Marshal Oudinot, who, after the battle of Bautzen, had been detached from the grand army to oppose Bulow in the neighbourhood of Magdeburg, more fortunate. The Prussian general took post at Luckan, with twelve thousand men, where he threatened the French line of communications, and strengthened himself, as well as circumstances would admit, by means of loopholes and barricades. Undinot attacked him there on the 4th July; but such was the vigour of the Prussian defence, that though the assailants succeeded in varrying the suburbs, which they set on fire, they could not penetrate into the toy n, and retreated at night, leaving five hundred prisoners and three guns in the hands of the victors, besides above fifteen hundred killed and wounded during the engagement. Immediately after this success, which diffused extraordinary joy over the neighbouring territory of Prussia, Bulow was joined by Generals Borstell, Borgen, and Harps, which raised his troops to mineteen thousand men, and their united forces threatened a most powerful diversion in the rear of the enemy (1).

This brilliant success, and the evident inferiority of the French to Attack on the French the Allies, both in the number and activity of their light troops, encouraged the gallant partizan leaders of the latter to attempt a still more important enterprize. Chernicheff, who had recrossed the Elbe after the affair at Halberstadt, having learned that General Arrighi was at Leipsic with five thousand men, besides an equal number of wounded, and considerable magazines, communicated with Woronzoff, who commanded the Russian blockading force that lay before Magdeburg, and they agreed to make a joint attack on that important depot. With this view, Chernichelf took up a position with some parade at Bernberg, so as to withdraw the enemy's attention from the real point of attack; and Woronzoff having meanwhile advanced to Dolitch, in the neighbourhood of Leipsic, Chernicheff, by a forced march of nine German, or thirty-two English miles in one day, joined him under the walls of the town. The French were so completely taken by surprise, that they had scarcely time to assume a position at Zaucha, in front of the town, when the Russian horse were upon them. The few cavalry they had were routed in a moment; and though their infantry opposed a more formidable resistance, yet they too were broken, and driven back into the town before half of the allied force had come up. Just as they were entering into action, and the united force was advancing to complete their victory, news arrived of the armistice, which, after an examination of the documents produced by Arrighi, proved to be correct, and the Russian generals were robbed of their well-carned success, and obliged to content themselves with the six hundred prisoners they had already taken. About the same time, Captain Colon, a Prussian partizan, who had remained in Saxony after the grand allied army retreated, incessantly annoying the enemy in the remote parts of Saxony and Franconia, having heard of the expected arrival of twenty pieces of cannon, and a large train of ammunition waggons on the road between Hoff and Leipsic, formed an ambuscade, and attacked the enemy with such success, that the whole artillery was destroyed, and the ammunition blown up. Colon was afterwards joined by Major Lutzow with six hundred horse, and a great number of partizans; and their united force having established themselves in the mountains of Vogtland (1), maintained a harassing and successful warfare, which was only terminated by the conclusion of the armistice.

⁽¹⁾ Lond, 63, 65. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 60. Jom. iv. 315.

While the operations of the Allies on the rear of the French in Saxony were thus far successful, and were exposing the enemy to losses, almost daily, even greater than those which had proved so fatal to their arms in the preceding autumn, when they lay at Moscow, a very considerable calamity was experienced, and a loss, attended with unbounded private suffering, undergone on the Lower Elbe. The battle of Lutzen, and withdrawal of the allied armies to the right bank of the Elbe, exercised an immediate and fatal influence on the situation of Hamburg. Tettenborn, Dornberg, and all the partizan corps on the left bank of the river, shortly after fell back to that city itself. Vandamme, acting under the orders of Davoust, shortly after appeared before the town, on the left bank ; and several gallant attacks of Tettenborn on his forces, led only to the canture of the Island of Wilhelmsberg, in the Elbe, not far distant from Hamburg. The French besieging force, however, was soon increased to ten thousand men; and with this array, which was double the strength of the whole regular force to which he was opposed, Vandamme carried the island of Mary 19. Wilhelmsberg, and all the islands of the river opposite to the city, which put him In a situation to commence a bombardment. This was, in consequence, begun the very next day. The dubions conduct of the Danishn gun-hoats in the river, for a few days suspended the fate of this unhappy city; but "ac rece" stand the Hamburg authorities that they must depend on their own resources. With speechless grief the patriotic citizens learned that they were to be delivered over to their merciless enemies; but the necessities of the case admitted of no alternative, and on the 59th, General Tettenborn evacuated the city, the terror of his arms in the north of Germany; and yet, so oppressive was the use which he made of his yletory, and so unbounded the exasperation excited by the endless exactions to which the unfortunate llamburgers were subjected, that it may be doubted whether he did not, in the end, lose more by this moral reaction, than by all the material resources which it placed at his command (2).

when both parties had such need of a respite in military efforts of means to complete their preparations, and draw closer the diplomate tree which connected, or were about to connect, them with the states from which they respectively hoped for succour, there was httle difficulty in coming to an accommodation for an armistice. The first overture for such a measure came from Napoléon, who on the 18th May, when setting out for the army, had, as already mentioned (1), dispatched a proposal, nominally for an armistice, but really designed to detach Russia from the coalition, and lead the Emperor Alexander into separate negotiations with himself. This letter arrived at the allied headquarters on the eve of the battle of Bautzen; and though it was received and considered in full council, in presenee of the Austrian minister Count Stadion, and the answer determined on, yet it was deemed expedient to delay the messenger bearing the answer till the issue of arms had been tried. The result of that experiment, however, by demonstrating the vital importance to the Allies of gaining time for their great reinforcements to come up, and their present inahility to cope with Napoléon, rendered them more tractable; and the messenger was dispatched with the answer from Stadion, bearing, "that the allied sovereigns were prepared to enter into the views of the Emperor Napoléon; too happy if these first overtures on his part, should be followed by others leading to an object which his august master, the Emperor of Austria, had so much at heart." Napoléon, however, who above all things desired to open a separate negotiation with the Emperor Alexander, and was not without hopes, if it were agreed to, of regaining the ascendancy of Tilsit and Erfurth, again, three days afterwards, dispatched a letter requesting a personal interview with that monarch; but this proposal, like the former one, was cluded by an answer, that Count Schomouloff was intended. on the part of Russia, to repair to the French advanced posts, which would save his imperial majesty the trouble of a journey for that purpose. Finding, therefore, that he could not succeed in this object of a separate negotiation, and feeling the necessity of yielding to the strongly expressed wishes of Austria for a general conference, Napoléon returned an answer that he agreed to the armistice (2); and the village of Pleswitz, in the eircle of Streigau, was deelared neuter, for the purpose of carrying the consequent arrangements into effect.

Even after this preliminary and important point had been agreed to, it was no easy matter to bring the opposite views of parties regarding the armistice to a definite bearing. The times were widely changed from those when Napoléon, after launehing forth the thunderbolts of Marengo, Austerlitz, or Friedland, dictated the terms to the vanquished on which he was willing to admit of a cessation of hostilities. He had gained, indeed, two great battles, and Europe again beheld the allied armies receding before him. They retired, however, unbroken and undisgraced: no dislocation of masses, or cutting off columns, had followed his victories; no troops of captives, or files of cannon, had graced his triumphs. The want of eavalry had marred his success, and rendered many of his best conceived enterprises abortive; the superiority of the enemy in light troops had frequently converted incipient triumph into ultimate disaster. Above all, the fascination of his name on other nations was at an end: Europe no longer awaited, in breathless anxiety, to receive his mandates; Austria, dark and ambiguous, was gradually rising from the attitude of a mediator into that of a commander. But the necessities of the Allies were at least as great: their reinforcements were still far distant; the victorious French legions pressed on their rear; the march to Schweidnitz had ahandoned their great line of communication with their own resources, and though they had reason to believe that Austra would join them, if Aspokon refused to make peace on reasonable terms yet six weeks at least, were required to enable her to complete her preparations (4). Both parties thus felt the necessity of a respite, but neither was sufficiently humbled to exince, by their conduct, their sense of this necessity, and the preparations of the regulations.

⁽¹⁾ Ante, ix. 105. (2) Fain, i. 400. Napoléon to Caulaincourt, May 225.

The i moof Napoleon at first insisted on the line of the Oder as the demarcad marce tools at the demarkation between the two armies, but to this the Allies positively refused to agree, and the fall of Breslau, the cantal of Silesia, a bich was occurred by the French arms, without resistance, on the 50th Max, rendered it less important for Atnoleon to insist on that limit. At the same time. intelligence was received of the accumation of Hamburg, by the united armies of Denmark and France. He crased to contend therefore, for the line of the Oder took his stand on the principle of att notsidetis, and invisted that his troops should retain the ground which they actually occurred, and this basis was contended for so strenuously by his pleninotentiaries, that it had wellmigh proved fatal to the negotiation, for the Russian and Prussian ministers were not less resolute that the whole of Silesia should be abandoned. The commissioners on both sides, unable to come to an agreement, had senarated. and hostlittes were on the point of being resumed, when the firmness of Napoleon, for the first time in his life, yielded in negotiation, and he agreed to abate so far in his demands as rendered an accommodation practicable the brought himself to al andon Breslau, to relinquish the line of the Olerand to draw back his army to Leignitz Conferences were resumed at Poisehuitz, near Janer, and on the 5th June, an armistice for six weeks was signed at that place between all the contending powers (2)

By this convention the line of demarcation between the hostile and the armiles was fixed as follows —Poschwitz, Leighltz, Goldherg, and Lahn, remained in the hands of the French, Landshitt, Rudelstadt, the confluence of the hatshach and O ler, the line of demarcation followed that river to the frontiers of Saxony and Prussia, and thence to the Elbe, which formed its course to its mouth. If Hamburg was only be-neged, it was to be treated as one of the Hoch aled towns, hantzie, Ho lin, Zamose, Stettin, and Lustrin were to be re-neutabled, at the sight ofcommissioners employed on both is less, every five days, Mag feburg, and the fortresses on the File, to enjoy a circle of a league in every direction, which was to be considered as neutral. The duration of the armistice was to be six weeks from its signature, or till it e Stil July, and sax days notification of the intention to break it, was to be given by either party. This convention was concluded solely by it eving error autifority of the aliced monarchy, for their plenipotentia-rice, privated at the continued bottlithes of the French trops, were on the joint of Iresking off the confirmed bottlithes of the French trops, were on the joint of Iresking off the confirmed see, when they were overruled, and the signature ordered by their sorrecings' express directions (3)

one deploral le engagement took place after the signature of the armistice was known, which I prope has had much cause to lament, and of which France has too much reason to be ashamed their the pretunct that the armistice are the 10 to the regular troops, I not

⁽¹ H of a i 161 163 Second a 225 Fale 6 | 13 Maria all 282 Second a 277 223 face 635 645

not to the irregular bands who had crossed the Elbe, a considerable time after the armistice was known on both sides, and when Lutzow's eorps, five hundred strong, were returning to Silesia, they were attacked by three thonsand men under General Fournier, when totally unprepared, and relying on the faith of the treaty at Ketzig, near Zeitz in Saxony, and in great part cut to nieces or taken. Among the rest was the poet Korner, whose patriotie strains had rung like a trumpet to the heart of Germany, and who advanced to parley with the French general, along with Lutzow, before the attack commeneed, and assure them that they were relying on the faith of the armistice. But the perfidious barbarian leader exclaiming, "The armistice is for all the world except you!" cut him down before he had even time to draw his sword. Korner's friends, by whom he was extremely beloved, instantly rushed in and reseued him and Lutzow from the hands of the enemy; and the poet was raised from the ground, weltering in his blood, to a neighbouring wood. from whence he was conveyed to a peasant's cottage, and ultimately taken in secreey to Dr. Windler's house in Leipsic, who, with generous devotion, received the sufferer under his roof at the hazard of his own life. Korner recovered the wound, but his immortal spirit quitted its worldly mansion on the 26th August 1815, when bravely combating the French army under the walls of Dresden. Such was the indignation excited by this treacherous act in Leipsie, that it was only by the presence of a very large French garrison that the people were prevented from breaking out into open insurrection: and though policy compelled the allied sovereigns at the time to suppress their resentment, and not avail themselves of the just cause thus afforded for breaking off the armistice, yet it sank deep into the heart of Germany. and increased, if possible, the universal horror at French domination, which so soon led to its total overthrow. "Armistice be it," was the universal erv: "but no peace; revenge for Körner first (1)."

Great talent No period in the career of Napoléon is more characteristic of the displayed by No period in the careful displayed by Napoléon in indomitable firmness of his character, as well as resources of his mind, than that which has now been narrated. When the magnitude of the disasters in Russia is taken into consideration, and the general defection of the north of Germany which immediately and necessarily followed, it is difficult to say which is most worthy of admiration; the moral eourage of the Emperor, whom such an unheard-of eatastrophe could not subdue, or the extraordinary energy which enabled him to rise superior to it, and for a brief season again chain victory to his standards. The military ability with which he combated at Lutzen-with infantry superior in number indeed, but destitute of the cavalry which was so formidable in their onponents' ranks, and for the most part but newly raised—the victorious veteran armies of Russia, and ardent volunteers of Prussia, was never surpassed. The battle of Bautzen, in the skill with which it was coneeived, and the admirable precision with which the different corps and reserves were brought into action, each at the appropriate time, is worthy of being placed beside Austerlitz or Jena. If it was less decisive in its results than those immortal triumphs, and partook more of the character of a drawn battle than a decisive victory, it was from no inferiority on his part in conception or combination; but because the Allies, animated by a higher spirit, taught by past misfortune, and invigorated by recent success, now opposed a far more obstinate resistance to his attacks; and the want of eavalry rendered him unable, as he was wont, to follow up European tactics and discipline with the fell sweep of Asiatic horse. Nor should due praise be withheld from the energy and patriotic spirit of France, which, unbroken by a calamity unparalleled in past history, again sent forth its conquering legions into the heart of Germany, and re-appeared with two hundred thousand victorious conscripts on the Elbe, within a few months after four hundred thousand veterans had left their bones, or sunk becomes by coosening to be in the common of the Proposed placed, he openly yielded to the influence of Austria; inspired her with a sense of her importance which she had not previously possessed; accelerated rather than retarded the period of her declaration gainst him; and lost the only opportunity which fortune afforded him, after the catastrophe of Moscow, of re-establishing his affairs. It is more than probable, gau, so n back, ceeded in intimidation the cabinet of Vienna, and inducing it, it is difficult to see in such a

⁽¹⁾ Deutche Pandora, Von Friedrich Kolle, Erlebtes Von Jat- 1019 A12 Riog Univ Sun Voca Körner.

and the state of t

numer tage that and alreaded of a defeated and dejected, it is another, and a serv different thing, to adhere to the banners of a recruited and reanumated farces noting in the midst of an enthusiastic and ilumicious polynomia,

The state of the s

, and some time time hands of the venture upon an abyss strened with flowers, proven my rum, and or on-teques .

effectually to secure its triumph.

The resurrection of Germany at this period to throw off the oppression of trench domination, is the most glorious and animating spectacle recorded in history. Not less heart-stirring in its spirit, not less entrancing exhibited by in its progress, than the immortal annals of ancient patriotism, Germany at this period, it was spread over a larger surface, and fraught with more momentous results. Wider civilization had extended the interests of the contest: a broader basis of freedom had swelled the ranks of patriotism; a purer religion had sanctified the spirit of the victor. No trains of captives attended his steps; no sacked eities were the monuments of his ferocity; no pyramids of heads marked where his sabre had been. Nations, not eitizens, now rose up for their deliverance; continents, not empires, were at stake on the battle; the world, not the shores of the Mediterranean, was the spectator of the struggle. Freedom inspired the arm of the patriot in both; but the Cross, not the Eagle, was now to be seen upon its banners, and the spirit of Christianity at once animated the resistance of the soldier, and stayed the vengeance of the conqueror. The efforts of France in 1795, were inspired by equal fervour, distinguished by equal intrepidity, followed in the end by equal triumphs; but the intermixture of worldly motives sullied the purity of the strife; the want of religion let loose the passions of vice; the lust of conquest, the selfishness of cupidity, were mingled with the ardour of patriotism; and the triumplis of the empire terminated in the ordinary atrocities of massacre, extortion, and devastation. Very different was the spectacle which the efforts of combined Europe now afforded. For the first time in the annals of mankind. the devotion of the eitizen was now sustained by the constancy of the martyr: the valour of the soldier ennobled by the purity of the patriot; the ardour of the victor restrained by the sanetity of the eause for which he combated; and the result proved the difference between the influence of worldly ambition and the obligations of religious duty. No massacre of Mytilene disgraced the laurels of the modern Salamis; no flames of Carthage drew tears from the modern Scipio; the smiling village and the protected fields were to be seen alike in the rear as in the front of the British host, and Moscow burned was avenged by Paris saved.

CHAPTER LXX.

FROM THE ARMISTICE OF PLISWITZ TO THE RENEWAL OF THE WAR.

ARGUMENT.

Importance of personal Ancedote in the Delinestion of Character-Rich miletally, in this reprict which east regrating Paspelon—General el rasiere of 1s Mide-Singular Combination of Good and Bad Qualities which be possessed—Clar which is afforded to his Character by his Bad Qualities—Internation of Great and Good ones—Sketch of the general Teatures of his Character—Mixed Good and Bad qualities which he possessed—I arose parily from the Views and Irrelegion of the Revolution—Incenterable pectualities of his Character—Despute nature of his System of Government—Which naturally flowed from the Revolution—His other contracted Perley, and repeated injuries to his own Fortunes—His personal influencess—great Military herors which he committed—Tspezully and on Horseback—fils Impetuosity in Travelling, and during a Campaign—Gustom in Drassing through columns of Troops—Recept of Departates on the Road—list Antichambers during a Campaign—Hablis and laboors in the Cabanet—Hablis in writing and dictailing

Acy-flis overflowing Courage, and simple Character-Ilis Military qualities-Inefficiency in separate command-Moral weaknesses-Character of Derthier-Diplomatic relations st this Period-First Convention between Great Britain, Russia, and Prussia-Treaty of Reichcoluen between these Powers-Convention of Peterusidau and of London, regarding the issue of Paper Money-Treaty of Stockbolm with Sweden-Alliance of France with Denmark - Impuriance of the Position which Austria now held- Views of the Cabinet of Vienna at this Period-Commencement of the Segotlation with the Belliger at Powers-Interties between Napoleon and Metternich-Hemarkable Speech of the former-Metternich s sorest -Napoleon's reply-Colm conduct of Metternich-Convention between Austria and I'rance for a Mediation-Intelligence is received by both Parties of the Battle of Vittoria-Vastinflumer it exercised on the Isauc of the Accoliations-Soult is sent with extraordinary powers to Spain-Sapoleon's preparations for War in Germany-life plan for the Campaign-And Measures for the defence of Breeden-Works around that Capital, and on the Fibe-Strength of his line on that River-Murmurs agalost these plans in the French Army- 13poleo is reply to il em-Ilis Forees at the coordision of the Armistice-And new Versure to force on the Conscripts to the Army-Aspect of Dresilen at this Period-Disposition at Napoleon's force in Germany - Deplorable condition of the Garrisons in his Pear -1 repart tions of the Allies during it a Armistice-Plan of the Compaign fixed at Trachenberg-Peflections on the admirable Wardors with which it was conceived-Determination of the Ca binet of Vienna to join the Allies - Doubts regard ng Bernadotte-Composition of his Army -trmy of Silesia-Character of Plucher-Character of General Guelsenao-The Austria Army at I rague-Character of Prince Schwartzenberg-Total of the Alli d Forces in action on the | the - forces of Loth aides on the Lavarran and Italian Frontiers-Cordial spirit and unanimity with which the Allied Powers were animated-Slow progress of the Degotiation at Prague-Difficulties which arose regarding the Form of the Conferences-Pest news of the diff rent Powers at this ferror - spoteon s journey to Mayence to meet Marie Louis Ultimatein of Austria to I raoce - lapoleon a answer wlich declines these Terms - Mail fento of fustria-Reply of I rance-Reflections on this Debate, and on the sebarquent Mapifesto of Austria-Larly flistory of I rince Melternich-Ills character as a Stateman-Ills

Private Honour and Patriotic Spirit—And principles of Government—His own Account of his Policy at this period—Universal Joy in the Allied Army at the junction of Austria—Last Review of Napoléon at Dresden—Interview of Napoléon with Fouche at that City—Fouche's Secret Interviews with Metternich at Prague—Arrival of Moreau in Europe—His reception at Stralsund by Bernadotte—His Journey to, and reception at Prague—Contention ahout the Appointment of a Commander-in-Chief to the Allies—Disinterested conduct of the Allied Generals in regard to the Command—Great influence of Wellington's Success on the Allied cause at this period.

HISTORICAL narrative, how important or interesting soever the events may be which it embraces, is not the composition which anecdote in the delinea gives the best insight into the character of the principal accharacter. tors in the scenes it records. General causes are there wound up, too much wound up, with individual agency; the stream of human transaction is too vast, its floods too overwhelming, to permit the salient points of private disposition to be adequately developed, even in those who have been ehiefly instrumental in directing its current. It is private incident which portrays the real man; it is the habits of domestic life which are the true touchstone both of the greatness and the weakness of humanity. The common maxim, that no man is a hero to those with whom he is familiar, indicates the universal concurrence of all ages in this truth; and the characters in public life, accordingly, which are most deeply engraven on the memory of mankind, are not those by whom the most important changes in history have been wrought, but those of whom the most graphic and touching incidents have been recorded by writers of capacity sufficient to discern their value. The heroes of antiquity, after the lapse of two thousand years, still seem present to our imagination; but if we examine the elements of which the still living phantoms are composed, we shall find that, while their great and important exploits are recollected only in a sort of shadowy grandeur, it is the incidents of their private life, the generosity of their individual actions, which are really enshrined in our memory; and that it is not so much even the pictured pages of Livy, Xenophon, and Quintus Curtius, as the Lives of Plutarch, which have given them immortality. In modern times, it is the Richard III and Henry VIII of Shakspeare, not those of history, who recur to every mind when our kings of the olden time are thought of; it is the Johnson of Boswell, not the author of the Rambler, or the learned lexicographer, who is present to every mind; and so feeble is the impression produced by real generalities, in comparison of fictitious details, that even the valour of Richard Cour de Lion, the beauty of Queen Mary, and the tyranny of Louis XI, are present to our recollection chiefly in the enchanting colours in which their characters have been drawn by the imaginative pencils of Schiller and Sir Walter Scott.

Rich materials, in this respect, such ample details exist in these respects as of Napoléon; and which exist regarding though they have been disfigured, in too many instances, by the nature coarse invective and profound hatred of another, yet it is not impossible for an attentive observer to distinguish the true from the false, even in these exaggerated statements. An experienced draughtsman will have no difficulty in separating sketches from nature from imaginary eonceptions, even of scenes which he has never himself visited; and those who have made themselves familiar with the peculiar and strongly marked traits of that wonderful man's character, will seldom be at a loss to distinguish the real from the fictitious anecdotes which have been preserved concerning him. The reader, therefore, will probably not regret, nor deem the pains misplaced, if advantage is taken of the pause in military operations which resulted from the armistice of Pleswitz, to throw together some of the most graphic and characteristic anecdotes which exist, detailed by eyewitnesses, of a man whose name will ever occupy the most conspicuous place in the annals of modern times

General What renders the traits of Napoléon's character improbable, and

ner characteristic, and find additional evidence of the authenticity of ancodotes descriptive of such a claracter, in the very arricy which appears at first sight so perplexing. It united, to a degree which was perings never before equalled, the ardent and impassioned temperament of southern, with the cool judgment and intellectual force of northern I turope, and it is hard to say, whether he was most distinguished by the admirable knowledge which he possessed of the grand and clevated in human conduct, and by the herripeared to be in any degree thwarted by a due observance of them the was not by disposition a cruel, nor by nature a bad man, that is, the wicked principles of humanity were not in any extraordinary degree developed in his chiracter it was by the entire absence of any moral control that he was principally distinguished

Let this absence did not by any means render his life a mere e minute that into an action of the by any means tender his high mere reported tissue of had actions, nor was it means been on many occasions and in with noble deeds, humane feelings, and beneficent intentions lie was too clearsighted not to perceive that such conduct was, in the general case, the most judicions, he knew well that similative ernelts usmally defeats its own object, and that the only solid foundation for the attachment of subjects to a sovereign, is to be found in a seclulous protection of their interests But the grand and peculiar characteristic of his mind was, that all this was done, not because he felt it to be right, but because he saw it to be expedient. Just ruling principle was interest invariably followed, not duty colubously performed, and accordingly, whenever he perceived, or thought he perceived, a conflict between these rules of conduct, he never hesitated an instant to give the preference to the selfish considerations-or rather, his mind was so entirely governed by their influence, that he never experienced, on such occasions, any mental conflict at all. the often said, that Corneille was the only man who understood the art of government, and that, if he had lived in his age, he would have made him a privy councillor (1). and the reason was, that while he thoroughly understood, and has nobly expressed, the most elevated sentiments, he always assigned the superior place to reasons of state policy, -In other words, consultrations of real or supposed expedience

This distinction, which never perhaps was so clearly defined in the state of the period and human being before his time, farmishes the true key to the state of the otherwise inexplicable character of Najoléon, and demonstrates that there is much truth, both in the obloginy which has been thrown upon him by his enemies, and the eulogies which have been pronounced on him by his admirers. If we contemplate him in one view, never was any character recorded in history more worthy of universal detestation. We behold a single individual, for the purposes of his own ambition, consigning whole generations of men to an untimely grave, desolating every country of Europe by the whirlwind of conquest, and earning the support and attachment of his own subjects, by turning them loose to plunder and oppress all mankind. In the prosecution of these objects we see him deterred by no difficulties, daunted by no dangers, bound by no treaties, restrained by no pity; regardless alike of private honour and public faith; prodigal at once of the blood of his people and the property of his enemies; indifferent equally to the execrations of other nations, and the progressive exhaustion of his own. We perceive a system of government at home based upon force, and resting upon selfishness, which supported religion only because it was useful, and spoke of justice only because it passed current with men; which at once extinguished freedom and developed talent; which dried up the generous feelings by letting them wither in obscurity, and ruled mankind by selfishby affording them unbounded—gratification. We see a man of consummate abilities, wielding unlimited powers for the purpose of individual advancement; straining national resources for the fostering of general corruption; destroying the hopes of future generations in the indulgence of the present; constantly speaking of disinterested virtue, and never practising it; perpetually appealing to the generous affections, and ever guided by the selfish; everlastingly condemning want of truth in others, yet daily promulgating falsehoods among his subjects, with as little hesitation as he discharged grapeshot among his enemies.

If we regard him in another view, however, we shall be led to form great quali. a very different estimate of his character. Never were talents of the ties. highest, genius of the most exalted kind, more profusely bestowed upon a human being, or worked out to greater purposes of good or of evil. Gifted at once with a clear intellect, a vivid imagination, and a profound judgment-burning with the fervent passions and poetic glow of Italy, and yet guided by the highest reasoning and reflecting powers; at once an enthusiastic student of the exact sciences, and a powerful mover of the generous affections; embucd with the soul of eloquence, the glow of poetry, and the fire of imagination, he yet knew how to make them all subservient to the directions of sagaeious reason, and the dictates of extensive observation. He was not merely illustrious on account of his vast military achievements, but from his varied and often salutary civil efforts. He was not a great man, because he was a great general: he was a great general, because he was a great man. The prodigious capacity and power of attention which he brought to bear on the direction of his campaigns, and which produced such astonishing results, were but a part of the general talents which he possessed, and which were not less conspicuous in every department, whether of government or abstract thought. It was hard to say whether he was greatest in laying down strategetical plans for the general conduct of a campaign, or in seizing the proper direction of an attack on the field of battle, or in calculating the exact moment when his reserves could be most effectually employed. And those who are struck with astonishment at the immense information and just discrimination which he displayed at the council-board, and the varied and important public improvements which he set on foot in every part of his dominions, will form a most inadequate conception of his mind, unless they are at the same time familiar with the luminous and profound views which he threw out on the philosophy of politics, in the solitude of St.-Hetena Never was evinced a clearer proof of the truth which a practical acquantiance with men mist probably have impressed upon every observer, that taleot of the highest order is susceptible of ony application; and that accident or Supreme direction alone determines whether their possessor is to become a Homer, a Bacon, or a Napoléon, the sould require the observation of a Thucydides, directing the nencel of a Taciers, to portray by a few touches such a characterand modern idean even in their hands would probably have proved soudequate to the task Equal to Alexander in mulitary achievement, superior to Justiman in legal reformation, sometimes second only to Bacon in nolitleal sagacity, he possessed at the same time the joexhaustible resources of Hannibal, and the administrative nowers of Casar. Enduring of fatique, nation of hardship, unweared in application, no difficulties could deter, no dangers daunt, no obstacles impede him; a constitution of aron, a muid, the ardour of which rendered him almost Insensible to physical suffering, enabled him to brave able the sun of Egypt and the snows of Russia: indefatigable in previous preparation, he was calm and collected in the moment of dancer, often on horseback for eighteen hours together, and dictating almost the whole night to his secretaries, he found a brief period for slimber during the roar of the battle, when the enemy's balls were falling around him (1). Nor was neace a neriod of repose to his genius. nor the splendour of courts a season merely of relaxation. Though not hisensuble to their attractions, though often indulging for a moment in their vices. he was never the slave of their pleasures; female charms exerted only a transient sway over his passions, and never clouded his reason; and when . . .

equaliant sancti, nu

vehement in anger, yet often forgaving on reflection; implicable in desired in political batted, but not insensible to hostilo esteem; mesorable in general measures, yet susceptible of Individual pity; wound up in his own clevation, yet ever identifying it with the glory of I rance; regardless able of crime or soffering in the path of ambition, yet not addicted to either If uncalled for by private interest or state policy—he could at once call his conscripts food for emnon, and borst that he could offord to spend ten thousand of them a-day, and yet bind up the wounds of Individual suffering, or sacritec his carriages to wounded valour. In one respect only he was allogether huphcable, and that was towards persons whose services to himself threatened to interfere with the supremey of his achievements, or whose enulty had proved an impediment to his ambitton. He never forgave shoreau the victory of Hohenlinden, which saved France; nor hellerman the charge at Marengo, which fixed himself on the consular throne; nor Wellngton the determined opposition wheh at last destroyed film. Generosity with him was often admirably assumed,

(f)) At the hattle of textures. Manuscon who was necture by I have been the report of an experience of the part by the restrict must fit the map new and appears and absolute or world residue appears for the night more than over find the parks were not supposed on an era-more are took by the fit of which the nowther action has the first part of the fit of the parks of the part of the part meture had her pights, which could not be a claimle with hopeus by and that he fit is never rout to give forth modern are countries the require the many returned to make making poul a log for this movement from a first returned a make methods 1 $90, $1, and has Catas, h. $96. $197.4 $10.

but self-forgetfulness was never really felt; where the object of the acting had ceased, egotism never failed to reappear in undiminished ascendency, and dispelled in a moment the pleasing illusion. He was capable of the heroic but politic self-denial of Alexander, which, by pouring the untasted cup on the sands of Arabia, assuaged the thirst of a whole army; but the designless magnanimity which put the draught to the lips of the Macedonian hero, when the physician was reading the denouncing letter, was beyond his reach. He could imitate Themistocles in surrendering himself, as he himself said, to "the greatest, the most powerful, and the most persevering of his enemies;" but he would never, like him, have swallowed poison to avoid being called on to clevate himself at the expense of his country. The man who shunned death at Waterloo, after he had himself told his army that "the hour had arrived when it behaved every Frenchman who loved his country to conquer or die," had no hesitation in bequeathing a legacy in his testament to the assassin who had attempted the life of the Duke of Wellington. He condemned the execution of Louis because it was a political error; but he hesitated not to murder the Duke d'Englien because it seemed a political advantage. He loudly denounced the alleged perfidy of the English attack on a neutral power at Copenhagen; but he scrupled not to seize the whole fortresses and royal family of Spain, in defiance of a strict alliance, when it gave him a throne; and his character cannot be so well summed up as in the words which profound reflection has enabled genius to ascribe to Satan. " He was the perfection of intellect without moral principle (1)."

Great part, however, of the selfishness which formed so important partly from the vices a feature, and damning a blot, in the character of Napoléon, is to be ascribed not so much to himself as to the age in which he lived, gion of the Be asembed not so much to ministrate and the people whom he was called upon to rule. Born and bred in the most corrupted society of Europe, during the irreligious fanaticism, general license, and universal egotism of the Revolution, he saw no other way of governing his subjects, but hy constantly appealing to their selfishness; and was led to believe, from what he saw around him, that it was the prime mover and universal spring of mankind. That it is so in the long run at all times, and among all people, to a great degre, no one experienced in the ways of men will probably doubt; but religious truth reveals the simultaneous agency of higher principles, and historical observation loudly proclaims that many of the most important changes in human annals have been brought about in direct opposition to its dictates. It was ignorance or oblivion of those counteracting agencies which was the grand error of Napoléon's life, and beyond all doubt brought about his fall. The Revolution misled him by establishing the fatal principle, that no other test is to be appied to human actions but success; the prevailing irreligion of the age misled him by spreading the belief, that worldly prosperity is at once the chief good in life, and the only rational object of human pursuit. To rouse exertion by the language of virtue, and direct it to the purposes of vice, was the grand principle of the Revolution, and the immediate cause of its triumplis; the Emperor felt that he had at no time a chance of success, but by yielding to its impulse; and at all times he could almost command events by wielding it for his advantage. Instead, therefore, of considering Napoléon as an individual man, and striv-

wide a field for exertion; and who has unconsciously but graphically portrayed, in the character of the Prince of Darkness, in his noble poem of "Stan, or, Intellect without God," much of what historic truth must ascribe to the ruling principles and leading characters of the Revolution.

⁽¹⁾ An expression of my highly esteemed friend the hev. Robert Montgomery, rector of St. Jude's, Glasgow, whose genius as a poet conveys an inadequate idea of his eloquence as a preacher, and fervour as a minister of religion, in a depraved manufacturing community, where Christian zeal has so

ing to reconcile the opposite qualities of his character, or harshly condemning its darker features, it is more consonant both to historic truth and impartial justice, to regard him as the personification of the principles which at that period were predominant in his country—as the legar warm of the principles which fewer vices. In this view, we may look upon the contest in which he was engaged as the same in sublunary affairs with that awful struggle darkly shadowed forth in Revelation, to which the peacif of shilton has given the form and pressure of terrestrial reality; and may view his fall as demonstrating the same Supreme direction of events, which, permitting for a season, for inserntable purposes, t able peruly action of fil

Inconeries

demonstrate the justice of Johnson's observation, that no man ever rose from om-

the spacetty of his political reflection, he yet deliberately based his throon upon the systematic oppression of all other nations by one; and seriously behaved that he needed not disquiet himself about the results, so long as, under the stimulus of glory and victory, he let loose his own subjects to plunder and insult every people over whom they ruled. He could survey past events with an eye seldom equalled in the justice of its observation, yet he throughout his octed upon the principle, that falselood was not only no crinice, but no error; that manking about the could be premanently misled by the relievated assertions of world, dooms enormous sin to work out its own punishment, never crossed tiga at marking and a significant state of his imagination. Though he committed, in the course of his career, many great crimes, and still more evident faults, he appeared to the very last to titical delniquency. Ilis conduct and language regarding himself would lead us to suspect at times that he had been born without a conscience, or that its voice had been entirely extinguished by the effects of early education, did not his measures on various occasions proved that he was not insensible to humane and clerated sentiments, and his language on all, afford decisive evidence that no man was better qualified to detect the slightest deviation from rectitude in the conduct of his opnoments.

Though his capacity in forming political designs, and even more structure, so in carrying them into effect, was soldom surpassed, yet in his general views of policy he was far from being guided by enlarged principles, and still further from acting consistently in the measurer requisite for their execution. Self, there as elewhere, formed the ruling principle and great blot in his character. Inviersal empire was the avowed object to which his his was desorted; but, suppoding such a design practicable, he adopted the means of all others the least intel to carry it into effect. The marganimous yet wite policy of consulting the interests, and hending to the prejudices of the conquered states, by which the Romans obtained the empire of the world in ancient, and the English the supremacy in Hindostan in modern times, never entered into his imagination. To concentrate the world in Europe, Europe in France, France in Paris, and Paris in himself, was the perpetual object of his ambition. Nor was it only over the bodies and properties of men that he proposed to establish this extraordinary dominion: chains still more durable, because less immediately galling, were prepared by him for their minds and thoughts. He laboured assiduously to transfer the seat of the papal power to Paris, in order to gain possession of the vast influence which it still possessed over the faithful in every part of Europe; while, by a deep-laid and comprehensive system of secular education, he strove to mould according to his will, that far more powerful portion of the people in his own country, who looked only to temporal advancement, and were swayed by nothing but temporal ambition. Thus, while he professed, and perhaps believed himself to be the man of the age, and the child of the Revolution, he ran directly contrary to the tenets of its supporters; or rather, he worked with perfect sagacity, to its natural result and termination, a system which, based exclusively on the selfish passions, was liable to be destroyed by their gratification, and which, subverting the influence of moral principle, left no other regulator for mankind but the government of llis despo-The oppressive government, and centralized despotism of Naporally nowed leon, therefore, were so far from being a deviation from his chafrom the Revolution, racter, or a divergence from the principles of the Revolution, that they were the obvious completion of both, and the natural termination of intellect set free from the restraints of principle. The previous convulsion had prepared the field for his dominion, and left him no other means of maintaining it but that which he adopted: the destruction of property had terminated the sway of aristocracy; the ruin of religion subverted the authority of conscience; the vices of democracy rendered intolerable the government of numbers. The character which he figured for himself, and the mission on which he often declared he was sent—that of closing the gulf of the Revolution-were in fact nothing but the direction of its principles to their inevitable end; the subjection of mankind to private selfishness and public slavery. And although, in the later years of his life, after the European alliance, founded upon religion and directed by aristocraey, had accomplished his overthrow, he again reverted to the language of democracy, and sought refuge in the arms of liberalism from the indignation of experience; yet this was a forced and unnatural union, suggested by interest, brought about by misfortune, and which could not, in any event, have subsisted longer than the mutual necessities which gave it birth.

But although we may discover in the vices by which Napoleon was surrounded, and on the impulse of which he was elevated to greatness, as well as in the necessities of his situation when placed there, an apology for the principles of his government, more can be found for the narrow views on which his policy was often based, and the littlenesses by which his private life was sometimes disfigured. In the prosecution of his favourite design of universal dominion, he neither displayed the enlargement of a great nor the views of a benevolent mind. When he had the power to remodel the European commonwealth almost at pleasure, and distribute its different governments according to the physical necessities or durable interests of their inhabitants, he appears to have been in general directed by no other principles but temporary convenience, national vanity, or family aggrandizement. Conceding to him the ment of uncongnerable perseverance in the war against England, whose overthrow was indispensable to the completion of his designs, and admitting that he expred extraordinary ability in the military and naval enterprises which he set on foot for her submiration . there is nothing in his foreign policy on continental Europe which evinced enlarged capacity, or bespoke aptitude for universal dominion. The fatal preponderance of self marred every thing which he attempted out of the pale of France itself. He conceived and executed the noble design of levelling the inhospitable ridges of the Alos; yet instead of forming, as he might have done, the whole Italian peninsula into the vast monarchy which nature has so clearly intended, and antiquity had so well prefigured, he cut it in the most arbitrary manner into shreds and natches, to form apparages for his family, or gratify the Parisians by the subjection of Rome to their government : and thereby lost the creat moral support which he might have derived from the revived national spirit of the Italian people. He hoasted, with justice, that he had realized the dream of Louis XIV, and that under his sway there were no longer any Pyrences, yet he subsequently marred, by selfish aggrandizement, that great enterprize, converted an obsequious ally into a mortal enemy, substituted popular hatred for courtly subservience, and reerected the Pyrenees, bristling with hostile bayonets, and recking with the blood of slaughtered nations. He reneatedly had the desuny of the German empire in his hands.

and by the lustre of his victories had not only obliterated the feeling of Gothic nationality, but converted the confederation of the Uhine into the firmest outwork of his empire; yet he voluntarily threw away that splended acquisition, cut up the fatherland into kingdoms for his brothers, or strango olishoots of the great empire; irritated Prussia herond foren eness, at once by insult and injury ; chienated the affections, without weakening the strength, of Austria, and purchased the applause of France, by the increiless severity of requisitions which drained away the resources, and exasperated the hearts of Germany. He more than once touched on the still vibrating chord of Polish nationality, and by a word might have added two hundred thousand Sarmatian lances to his standards; but he did not venture on the bold step of re-establishing the throne of Sobjeckl; and by the half-measure of the Grand Duchy of Warsaw, permanently excited the lealousy of linsua, without winning the support of Poland. No one felt more strongly, or has more clearly expressed, the necessity of providing, by a brin Luropean alliance, against the encroachments of the Muscovite army, or made greater efforts to resist them; but he himself gave them their strongest development; for, by unheard-of treachers on his own part, he converted the hereditary religious haired of the Ottomans into their ally; while by intolerable arroganco he not only stilled the long-established realonsy of Sweden, but threw his own heutenant, its ruler, but their arms. He was desirous الموافقة المراج والمناوع فراح والمراج terra je til se gje sila sila to the contract of tyetta ita ka order them in the section thorns in Spain; drove the second in seek, refuge in freat Pritain, to avoid his persecution; compelled a third, by his arrogance, to ablicate the throne of Holland; and precipitated a fourth into semuality at Cardel to forget his Indignities. No one was more sensible of the sway of religion over the human inhal, or more destrous of securing its cooperation as an instrument of government; yet he voluntily threw away, in later years, the immense alwantages which his earlier and wiser policy had given him in that respect; converted the Pope from a warm ally into a mortal enemy, for the gratification of calling Rome the second city of his empire; and exhibited the scandal to all Christendom of the head of the Roman Church, bereft of his dominions and detained in captivity, praying for the triumph of heretical arms for his deliverance. The grand object of his life was the destruction of the influence and overthrow of the maritime power of England, and yet no one ever contributed so much to its extension; for, by the rigours of the continental system, he made all the people of Europe sigh for the return of unrestrained enjoyment from her commerce; while, by the vexations of his domination, he arrayed all its forces in dense and burning battalions under her sway. The children of this world may be wiser in their generation than the children of light, but it is during that generation only.

These flagrant errors may be traced, in a great degree, to the insensibility to moral reaction, and Supreme superintendence, which formed such a striking feature in the character of Napoléon; but there are other peculiarities which will not admit of the same explanation, and which demonstrate that he had the full share of the littleness as well as the greatness of mortality. With unconquerable perseverance and merciless rigonr, he enforced the continental system, during the greater part of his reign, in all the countries subject to his authority; yet he himself was the first to set the example of evading his own decrees, for the sake of temporary profit to himself; and while he was shooting in the maritime departments wretched shopkeepers who smuggled a pound of sugar, and heading a crusade of western Europe against Russia to enforce its observance, he himself was daily amassing treasure in the vaults of the Tuileries, by selling licenses to deal in contraband goods, to an extent which defeated the whole object of his policy in that vital particular. He was well aware of the support which the fidelity of his marshals and chief dignitaries gave to his empire, and his extraordinary knowledge of the human heart gave him unbounded sway over the affections of his soldiers; yet he alienated the attachment of all in authority, but a few personal followers, by the occasional rudeness of his manner, and the repeated fits of ill-humour with which he received any ill success, or the slightest deviation from his commands. Great as he was, he evinced an unpardonable littleness in the envy which he felt at celebrity in others, and the tenacity with which he clung to the externals of power in himself. He outshone the military glories of Sylla, but he could not, like him, have laid down his power, and returned to the walks of private life; his exploits were greater than those of Cæsar, but he could never have refused the proffered crown even when he enjoyed its power. When scated on the throne of Charlemagne, he was afraid of the talents of Madame de Staël, and envious of the heauty of Madame Récamier; and the Emperor who had borne with noble equanimity a fall from the greatest throne in Europe, often found his screnity overturned at St.-Helena, by the English sentinels addressing him, in obedience to their orders, by the title of general.

Great millight from the military capacity of the Emperor on most occasions was without an equal in modern times, his recklessness and obstinacy committed. at others were not less remarkable; and accordingly, if history can hardly find a parallel to the achievements which he effected, it can produce none to the disasters in which they terminated. He repeatedly committed faults as a general, for the least considerable of which he would have made his lieutenants lose their heads. The imprudence of delivering a pitched battle with inferior forces at Aspern, with the Danube traversed only by two bridges, shaking under the swoln torrent, in his rear, was that of risking his crown at Leipsie, in a situation where, while combating a 1 10 700 700 1101

own observation, that the first duty of a commander is never to fight with a strait or defile in his rear (1). The imprudence in lingering so long at Moscow, lat'an and or names property of that campaign itself are mainly to be ascribed to his extreme imprudence, in advancing, contrary to the advice of his most experienced generals, to Moscow from Witepsk, without either force adequate to subdue Russia, or any sufficient preparation for retreat in the event of disaster; and the simultaneous loss of Spain was chiefly owing to the uncalled-for temerity of rushing into the Russian contest, while the Peninsula, a devouring ulcer, was still unsubdued in his year.

Especially When hard pressed by the troops of coalesced Europe in Germany, in Gerester, and unable to array an adequate force to combat them, he sacrificed his best troops in his empire, a hundred thousand strong, in the fortresses on the Elbe and the Vistula; and when reduced to fifty thousand combatants on the plains of Champagne, he lost, by his obstinate adhesion to the fortresses on the Rhine, a force which would have enabled him to drive the invader beyond that harrier stream. In these, and many similar instances, especially in the later stages of his eareer, it was evident that Nanotrace to below to make to a vest The second of the second of the second liberty of Europe that these numerous and glaring errors were committed by the French emperor in his warlike career; for such was the profound ability it i , - att an panag'and t a pel it traffin i ig staciane par i it a mataliface effif with a first troop got to the frequently to sacrifice ultimate safety to present dazzling of the multitudeit is doubtful whether he would not have attained universal dominion, and the independence of nations been permanently crushed, as in ancieut times, under the voke of military power.

The plane it is pleasing, where so many and such serious faults have been of ballot committed, to have some redeeming actions to record; and they, in Napoleon's case, are of such a kind, and occurred at such a time, at almost to demonstrate that it was the pressure of political considerations, the experienced necessity of Leeping in constant excitement the passions of the der and figure street. The sajutations about af dered at primal improvable "-It, Book of Sizes

⁽¹⁾ Thu, ecteti agin, was the speaks of his

^{(1) &}quot;The Ent require of a hell of bottle use albet marchale our Virthean" soes Mirthel 91 the world that he was doing so ; but acceptant by & fatality which be felt it begennalie to provid, "and to Lind word has been heroic courage and military ability. Disdaining to submit even to the forces of combined Europe, but feehly seconded by a large portion of his subjects; heading an array depressed by unparalleled disasters, and an empire exhausted by unexampled efforts-he found, in his own genius, a counterpoise to these accumulated difficulties; and by the depth of his combinations, the vigour of his execution, the skilful use of an interior line of communication. and the incomparable rapidity which he infused into his followers, long held the fate of Europe halanced, even against forces four times superior, and a moral energy, roused by long previous oppression and recent victory, which it seemed impossible to resist. It is on that memorable campaign, and the immortal one which early laid the foundation of his fortunes on the Italian plains, that his great fame as a general will ultimately rest; for in both he was destitute of the advantages of numbers, which in the intermediate periods he in general possessed, and found, in his individual resources, a power which, in the first instance conquered, and in the last all but conquered, the most rigorous fortune. And, if sound political judgment must condemn the pride which made him so obstinately refuse the conditions offered to him at-Chatillon, and throw all, even in that extremity, upon the hazard of war; yet it must be admitted that there was something magnanimous in his resolution to run every hazard, rather than sit down on a degraded throne; and to those who weigh well the peculiarities of his situation, wielding a revolutionary sceptre, and supported by revolutionary passion, it will probably appear that he had, in reality, no other alternative; and that submission would have led him, by a process slower indeed, but equally certain, to destruction.

Perhaps no general, in ancient or modern times, ever possessed over the so unbounded a sway over the minds of his soldiers, or had created minds of his among the inferior ranks of the army such a devotion, it might almost be said idolatry, towards his person. This was very far, indeed, from being the case among the marshals and superior officers—a great proportion of whom were in secret alienated from him by the occasional rudeness of his manner, his frequent sallies of temper, the interminable wars in which he plunged them, and the rigour with which he exacted success, as the sole condition of obtaining favour, or even justice, at headquarters. As little was it occasioned, as was so often the case with the captains of antiquity, by the generous self-denial with which the Emperor shared the bed, and partook the fare, of the common soldiers; occasionally, indeed, he visited the bivonacs, and during the Moscow retreat he relinquished his carriages to the wounded, and marched on foot in the middle of his staff; but these were the excentions, not the rule; and, in general, the personal comforts of the Emperor, during a campaign, were studied with the most scrupulous attention, and attained to a degree that almost appears inconceivable. His carriage, in which he always travelled, except when in presence of the enemy, was roomy and luxurious: a portable library of choice authors was at hand to amuse his leisure moments; his table, served up with the utmost nicety, exhibited always the best cookery. Porcelain and gold plate of the finest description were constantly made use of, and the same etiquette and distinctions were observed in his campaign tent, or temporary lodging, as at the palace of St.-Cloud (1). It was the pains which he took to seek out and distinguish merit and talent among the private men, or inferior ranks of the army, joined to the incomparable talent which he possessed of exciting the enthusiasm of the French soldiers by warlike theatrical exhibitions, or brief heart-stirring appeals in his proclamations, which constituted the real secret of his success; and if the use of proper words, in proper places, be the soil of cloquence, nevertid human being possess the art in higher perfection than Napolton.

⁽¹⁾ Odel. i, 159, 160, 191, 196.

the legion of honour to the most deserving, and the instant promotion of extraordinary mornt on the field of battle, were the usual occasions on which these heart-string exhibitions took place. They were in general arranged after the following manner—Ou the day fixed for the distribution of the eagles, the Emperor, followed by a spleodid staff, entered the square of the regiment, which was drawn up on three sides freing inwards, the fourth being occupied by his suite. At the word given, all tendents licritier then approached the Emperor on foot; the drums bert, and his took the eagle, with which he advanced to his side. Applien then raised his left hand towards the eagle, holding the rens, according to his usual custom, with his right. He then said in a deep and impressive voice—"Soldiers of tho—th regiment, I entrust to you the French eagle; it will serve as your rallying point; you swear never to abridion It until death! You swear never to permit an affront upon the honour of France! You swear to prefer death to dishonour! You swear!" with last words were pronounced in a solemn tone, with inconceivable energy. The officers rused their swords, and the men repeated—"We swear!" with unbounded enthusiasm. The eigle was then delivered to the colonel of the regiment. With such impressive solemnities were the eagles presented to three regiments at once on the plains of Leipsic on the 15th October, the very day before the fortunes of France were overthrown on that memorable field (I).

Distribution of the decorations of the legion of honour, and it was a stream of the promotion of distinguished soldiers, furnished other occasions with more of which the Emperor eagerly availed lunself to renew these engineers thus, and the Emperor eagerly availed lunself to renew these engineers thus, and the founded, that the career of distinction was open able to all of whatever grade, and that a private soldier might reach the marshal's baton through the portals of the birouse. It may readly be concelled that these theatical exhibitions were got up by no small amount of careful perparation; that the apparent recognition by the I imperor of a vertical of the color the Pyramids was in general the result of previous enquiry; and that a minute report by the officers of the regiment, was the basis on which the calculated to rouse the emulation, and of a great military republic, of which if e

Emperor was the chief; and they were, above all, founded on a perfect knowledge of the temperament, at once vehement and excitable, of the french soldier. When a regiment had performed, or was about to perform any villeing action, the men were drawn up, and the apprants from each of its battalions were led up to the Emperor in front of the line; and the lientenantcolonels presented the names and services of each on little tablets to him, and the selection was made. On these occasions, a freedom of speech was indulged to the soldiers, which savoured strongly of a military republic, and offered a wide contrast to the studied servilities in the ordinary case of imperial eliquette.

Frequently officers, and even private soldiers, whose claims had in which he been unsuccessful, remonstrated in firm though respectful terms indulced his soldiers on with the Emperor, and, if they had reason on their side, their efforts were not unfrequently successful. "Sire, I have deserved the cross!" was the usual commencement of the remonstrance. "llow so?" replied the Emperor, smiling;—the battles in which the aspirant had been present, and the services he had performed, were then recounted; and if the officers present confirmed the statement, the request was at once granted. Napoléon was far from being displeased at the military frankness with which these requests were sometimes urged, and which would not have been for an instant tolerated in a civil functionary: the vehemence with which he himself addressed his officers, seemed to provoke and justify a similar style in the reply-"F-," said he once to Sebastiani, contrasting the limited exploits of his horse with those of Latour Maubourg's enirassiers, " act like them : you command a troop of blackgnards, not soldiers." "I do not command blackguards, Sire," said Schastiani in a firm but respectful tone; at the same time representing rapidly the reason which prevented his troops from achieving more. Macdonald supported him, and together they succeeded in reducing the Emperor to silence; but his indignation broke out in violent invectives against all Schastiani's officers, as their regiment defiled before him, while he loaded those of Latour Maubourg with eulogiums (1).

Such was the violence of the Emperor's temper, especially in the · llis violent temper, but later periods of his career, that he not unfrequently struck the forgiveness, generals or high functionaries who were near him (2). This infirmity was well known to those who were habitually about his person-in particular, Berthier, Caulaincourt and Duroc; and, to avoid the scandal of such seenes, they usually endeavoured to remove the bystanders, and not unfrequently took an opportunity of throwing the victim of the Emperor's wrath in his way some time after, when his humour had subsided, when he was often forgiven. It was a common saying accordingly among those who knew him best, that though fearfully violent, he was not rancorons in his disposition (3); and numerous instances occur in his life of his total oblivion of passing subjects of anger. But if his durable interests, or those of his empire, had been affected, either by services which eclipsed his own, or by disasters which could not be relieved, he was altogether inexorable, and retained an Italian's jealousy or hatred to the hour of his death (4).

By long experience, joined to great natural quickness and precision of eye,

⁽¹⁾ Odel. i. 169, 171.
(2) "Napoleon was subject to terrible fits of passion and ill-humour. When he was at a loss for a good reason to oppose to those who contradicted him, he gave vent to his indignation by a short dry answer; and if any farther resistance was made, he proceeded to rude extremities. To avoid the scandal of such scenes, which my character was little fitted to hear, I cut the matter short, by taking a grave and respectful leave. During the campaign at Moscow, I had a quarrel with him which lasted three days, and I had actually resigned my situation, and petitioned for a command in Spain. He sent for me, however, at the end, and said, 'I won't send you to be killed in Spain; you know we are two lovers; who can't live without each other, "— CAULAIA-tour, i. 318, 319.

^{(3) &}quot;Croyez-moi, il n'est pas méchant, disaient ses officiers supérieurs à son égard, quoique ce penchant à une colère excessive était comm."— Opei. i. 17(.

⁽⁴⁾ Odel. i. 141, 171, 172. De Pradt, Varsovic. 44, Caul. i, 317, 318.

ł

Entered he had acquired the power of judging, with extraordinary accusate process and he had acquired the amount of the enemy's force opposed to him in the formation of the probable result of movements, even the nost complicated, going forward in the opposite armies. The root of artillery, the smoke and rattle of musketry, even the falling of halls around him, were alike unable to diver his steady gaze, or disturb his accurate judgment. Never was he known to be mistaken in the estimate which he formed on the distance, or approach of the fire of the enemy. Even in the farthest extremits of the horizon, if his telescope could reach the hostile columns, he observed every

onld

be surreved, than he looked around mut to. ...

tele-cope, and immediately formed a clear conception of the position, forces, and intentions of the whole hostile array. In this way he could, with surprising accuracy, calculate in a few minutes, according to what he could see offtheir formation, and the extent of ground which they occupied, the numerical force of armies of sixty or eighty thousand men; and if their troops were at all scattered, he knew at once hon long it would require for them to concentrate, and how many hours must elapse before they could unknew their attack. On one occasion, in the autumn of 1815, some of Aspoléon's generals expressed an opinion that he might expect an attack on the side of hohemit. "From what I can see," said he, calm't clear he his telescope, "the enemy have there into corps of sixty thousand men; they will require more than one day to concentrate and be ready to attack; we may pursue his are

t and loss or miners of immittale time . I for this lerthier

could not remain a moment quiet with the same of an excling or disquieting hind was received, be not infrequently pointed the whole sunf-log nitio the hollow of his band, and shoulfied it all at or ce up his nosting (2)

This power of judging by life eye of the distance, numbers, and designs of the enemy, was of peculiar value to Napoleon in the state of the state of 1815, in consequence of the great deficiency of light troops on his own part, as well as the extraordinary skill and determined the state of the numerous I and of their in the service of the eventy

The peasants, too, even in Sasoov, were all houle, and communicated the religence as readily to the Alberta at ley withheld it from him, so it at levent found him him the information, either from his own troops, or the indalization of the country in which the operations were conducted. His turn of mind was essentially mathematical, and he are held the orderary rules of from metry and trigonometry, with surprising quickness and accuracy, to the march and distance of troops, by a sort of intuitive mental operation, without the aid of either diagrams or calculations. Nevertheless, this turn of mind, though of immense service in the field, and in presence of the enemy, was not without its inconvenience; and it contributed to bring about some of the greatest disasters in which the detached corps of his army, at the later periods of the war, were involved. The Emperor, being accustomed to consider every thing with geometrical precision, and to estimate human strength and capacity at its highest average, calculated upon the march of his different corps as he would have done on the result of an arithmetical calculation, and was as much surprised when the one failed him, as he would have been if the other had done so. Knowing, by experience, that men could march, when in good spirits, ten leagues a day, and often combat after it, he too often reckoned on their being always able to do so, and took not the smallest account of the exhaustion arising from bodily fatigue, want of shoes, mental depression, or scanty rations (1).

Indefatigable himself in the pains which he took to provide subhis impetis- sistence for his troops, and accurately calculating the period when ous temper and habits. the supplies ordered should arrive at their several points of destination, he invariably acted on the supposition that they had done so; and was deaf to all representations that the troops were starving, because he had given directions sufficient, if executed, to have prevented such a calamity. He never took into consideration the many cases in which the commissariat were physically unable to execute his orders, especially for the feeding of the enormous multitudes which were latterly assembled under his banners, or the still more numerous ones in which their faithful performance was eluded by the negligence or cupidity of inferior functionaries. Thus he was eonstantly exacting from his officers and soldiers services which they were altogether unable to perform; and gave vent to the most violent sallies of illhumour against his generals; which alienated them not a little from his person, when in consequence battles were lost, or corps failed to reach the prescribed point at the appointed time. Yet such was the terror produced by the vehemence of his temper, and such the experienced benefit of falling in with his opinions to the personal interests of those around him, especially in his later years, that few had the moral courage necessary to withstand the ebullition consequent on the disclosure of unexpected and unpleasant truths, and fewer still the virtue to resist the prospects of fortune and promotion, consequent on chiming in with his opinions. His conceptions were so vivid, his temper so ardent, his mind so vehement, that he became, after his accession to the empire, almost incapable of bearing contradiction, or hearing painful truths; and to such a length did this arrive, that his generals ceased to report their losses to headquarters, for fear of being deprived of their commands; or the details, if transmitted, produced no impression, and he pre-

(1) Odel, i. 129, 130. "The precision with which he was accustomed to see the marches he ordered executed by his generals, led him to believe that it was easy to provide for the wants of an army. His dietatorial tone appeared to him as sufficient to procure bread and meat, as it was to assemble his corps at a given nical, as it was to assemble his corps at a given point. He was too much occupied with his mathematical or geographical calculations to pay much attention to the tedions operation of providing for his troops. He detested that part of the service, as continually thwarting his projects. Daru, from the fear of irritating him, did not, on such matters, frequently venture to represent the greatness of the danger. Napoléon thought he had sufficiently provided for that department, by ordering that a great quantity of pravisions should be sent from France. Every one knew how these supplies were intercepted, by the negligence or cupidity of inferior agents, but no one had the caurage to tell him so; or possibly they allowed the evil to go on, that necessity might at length divert him from his system of conti For long him from his system of contithe private soldier had value."-Opfleben, i. '

scribed attacks to them (1), on the supposition that their effective men were double of those actually present with the eagles (2)

This vehicuted and untractible character of Napoleon's mind, which exercised so great an influence at every period over his time. Fortunes, long sustaining them in critical circumstances by the force of indominable re-olution, and involving him in the end, from the effects of obstinacy, in unlicard-of calamities, was in some measure, doubtless, owing to t power, racterizes.

it was after the manner of the Grientals, rather than the Lord Callowed neither the dictates of truth, nor the lessons of experience, but the vivid pictures and vehement suggestions of his own fervent imagination.

Control to intensity of these impressions, that they made him entirely truth is intensity of insance of hence the complaint, so comater years, that he had an msunctive aversion to trath, and that he could sceire his favour but by anticipating and confirming his preconcerred opinions. It was not that he

the abstract, but that he resisted every existing current of his ideas. From

the abstract, but that he resisted every

existing current of his ideas. From the country of the factor of the attack on Spain, that he had done wrong or committed a mistake in his life. His ideas were conceived in the vivid imagination of the Last, and final more frequently founded on abstract conceptions than practical observation, but they were developed with the strictness of geometrical demonstration, and engraven on his mind in characters more durable and unalterable than the sculptures on Feynman grante [6].

ration it was very early in life that Napoléon secladed himself as it were present from other nien, and became impressed with the lofty chiects to have a second representation for the large training of the large o section, that even at that early person ne see.

ples "I will be make all Dreules still be "a de in deallisation for the invites and prost of set and the latter than the invites and prost of set and the latter than the set of spectrums bereal the latter between the set of spectrums bereal the Elize Be was maker tool use. I sowered respect fairly bell freely that if all not be how if no parales for I readers to Lemons such a depat I were for feel adoletion for the Lappeners all reseal. I want for feel adoletion for the Lappeners all reseal is not tends, this man last propertial? and Earther in the which the answers "Source was some fair ways for the all amount from he sught marks the laws partners and most of the second and the latter than the latter of the latter to the latter to the laws partners and most of the second and the [2] "The Type I form 3 3 January 1. 3 January 1.

to las Come Litt

distance as he afterwards did in the court of the Tuileries. Shortly after his entry into Milan, in the same year, some one hinted to him, that with his vast reputation it would be no difficult matter to establish himself permanently in that duchy. "There is a finer throne than that vacant," replied the future successor of Charlemagne. "There are two tottering thrones which I am about to prop up," said he in 1794, when out of employment after the siege of Toulon-"those of Constantinople and Persia." To overthrow the Turkish empire, and establish himself on the throne of Constantine, was the real object of his expedition to Acre in 1799; and even after he had seized the consular sceptre, he still looked to the east as the appropriate scene of his glory, and the only theatre of great achievements. "There has been nothing to be done in Europe for two hundred years," said he in 1804, "it is in the east only that great things are to be done." All his ideas of universal empire in the west tended to, and were designed as preparations for that one favourite object of oriental ambition; it was to prepare the way for its accomplishment, that he pursued England with such persevering hostility, and incurred all the hazards of the Peninsular contest; and his secret design in advancing to Moscow was less to plant his standards on the walls of the Kremlin, than to prepare the way for the seizure of Constantinople, and follow in the footsteps of Cyrus and Alexander (1).

He had a very low opinion of human nature; an opinion which opinion both will be probably shared with him to the end of time by all persons in authority who are witnesses to the baseness and servility with which they are surrounded. "Tacitus," said he, "wrote romances; Gibbon is a declaimer; Machiavel is the only author really worth reading (2)." Itmust be admitted, he put in practice many of the maxims of the Florentine sage, and doubtless saw enough around him to justify the view he took of mankind. His opinion of women was still lower; he never could be persuaded to converse with them seriously on any subject, or regard them as any thing but play things or objects of pleasure (3); he felt, with Bacon, their value to young men as mistresses, to old as nurses; but utterly denied their utility even to middle life as companions (4). It was his favourite position that the Orientals understood much better how to dispose of the female sex than the Europeans; that the harem was the true scene both of their respectability and their usefulness, and that if it were not for the object of having a family no man of sense would ever marry. His well-known answer to Madame de Staël, when asked by that celebrated wit, "Whom do you consider the greatest woman that ever existed?" "She that had the greatest number of children," was not a mere casual repartee, but the felicitous expression of his deliberate opinion (5). His amorous propensities, nevertheless, were violent, and his infidelities frequent; but none of his fancies ever influenced his conduct, or affected his judgment in other matters, and they were generally of very short duration. There was a brusquerie and precipitation in his manner towards

⁽¹⁾ De Pradt. Varsovic. 17, 18. Odel. i. 11.
(2) De Pradt, Varsovic, 17.
(3) "Lave," said Napoleon, "is the occupation of an idle man; the amusement of a busy one; and the shipwreek of a sovereign."—LAS CASES, ii. 15.
(4) The Emperor, who knew men so well, was ignorant of women. He had not lived with them ignorant of women. He had not lived with them, and did not understand them; he disclaimed so futile a study. His sensations, entirely physical in regard to them, admitted no influence from liveliness, intelligence, or talent; he had an aversion to their being learned or celebrated, or emerging from their ordinary domestic sphere. He placed them in the social order, at the lowest scale, and never could admit that they should have any influence over the will. A noman was in his eyes an agreeable piece of creation, a pretty plaything. an amusing passetemps, but nothing more. Attempts have been made to give a romantic character to his ephemeral amours; but the truth is, that he never was the weakest in these liausons; he never felt the delirium when the intunciated heart gives more than is sought of it. "Love." said he, " is a foolish pre-occupation, and nothing more, be assured of that."— CAULAILCOURT, i. 158.

⁽⁵⁾ Las Cases, v. 242.

women, both in public and private, which his greatest admirers admit to have been repugnant to every feeling of female delicaes. He had hardly any conversation to address to them in the saloons of St -Cloud, and still less in the privacy where his passing intrigues were carried on; he thought-and often found—that they should yield as fast as a beleacuered fortress did to the assault of his grenadiers. He never got the better, as hardly any one ever does, of the want of the society of elegant women early in life, and on occasion of his marriage with Marie Louise in 1819, he accosted her rather as a grisette who had been won by a three weeks' tidelity, than the daughter of the Casars who had been the prize of a hundred victories (1).

No words can convey an adequate idea of the indefatigable acpowers of tivity of the Emperor, or of his extraordinary power of undergoing mental and bodily fatigue. He brought to the labours of the cabinet a degree of industry, vizour, and penetration, which was altogether astonishing. Those who were most in his confidence, were never weary of expressing their admiration at the acuteness, decision, and rich flow of ideas which distinguished his thoughts when engaged in business. When he recoved despatches, the first sten was to call in the officer who brought them. and question him minutely as to all the particulars not specified in the writing ; and not unfrequently his secretaries, or the officers in attendance, had to undergo similar interrogatories as to the places and distances which were the theatre of action. Having accounted the requisite information, he at once took his decision, and it was only on very particular occasions that he adsourned the consuleration of any thing to the day following No one better understood or more thoroughly practised be Witt's celebrated maxim, the justice of which is probably well known to all engaged extensively in active life, that the great secret of getting through business is to take un every tlung in its order, and do only one thing at a time During a campalen, he set no bounds to the fatigue which he underwent. Often, after reading desn stelles, or dictating orders to one set of secretaries during the whole day he would commence with another relay at night, and with the execution of a few hours' sleep on his sofa, keep them hard at work till the following morning. The fervour of his imagination, the vehemence of his concentions, scenied to render him insensible to the fatigues of the moment, which were felt as altogether overwhelming by his attendants, less wrapt up than him in the intense anticipation of the future (2).

H a bal to If, in the course of a campaign, be met a courier on the roat, he generally stoppe I, got out of his carriage, and called Herthier or Canbuncourt, who sat down on the ground to write what the Imperor I requently then, the officers around blue were sent in different directions, so that hardly any remained in attendance on his person (5) When he expected some intelligence from his generals, and it was supposed that a battle was to contemplate n. he was generally in the most auxious state of dequeetude, and not unfrequently in the middle of the night called out aloud, " (all l'Albe, (hits rincipal secretary;) let every one arise " He then began to work at one or two in the morning; having gone to bed the night before, according to his invariable custom, at nine o'clock, as soon as he had ⁽¹⁾ the Praft Lemann I' Copasque It on tre d top a 3 2 to justice corrects when the free age to provide the two corresponds on a second provided by the provided the second that with the understand the with the understand of one and the two is a contract of the provided that we will be understand the provided the provided the provided the provided the provided the country to Lucytu put were be a country!

assembling the before any marriar extension that been performed where Kerner He was a different for the thick, and then was then a de tage from a to the things.

⁽¹⁾ In 1 ion 1/21 Gt, 1 t 11 111 (1 In Com, 1 1)*

dined. Three or four hours' sleep was all that he either allowed himself or required; during the campaign of 1815, there was only one night—that, when June 10, 1813, he rested at Gorlitz, after the conclusion of the armistice, that he slept ten hours without wakening. Often Caulaincourt or Duroc were up with him hard at work all night. On such occasions, his favourite mameluke, Rustan, brought him frequently strong coffee, and he walked about from dark till sunrise, speaking and dictating without intermission in his apartment, which was always well lighted, wrapped in his night-gown, with a silk handkerchief tied like a turban round his head. But these stretches were only made under the pressure of necessity: generally he retired to rest at eight or nine, and slept till two; then rose and dictated for a couple of hours; then rested, or more frequently meditated for two hours alone; after which he dressed, and a warm bath prepared him for the labours of the succeeding day (1).

Ilis travelling carriage was a perfect euriosity, and singularly characteristic of the prevailing temper of his disposition. It was dihabits on the road. vided into two unequal compartments separated by a small low partition on which the elbows could rest, while it prevented either from encroaching on the other: the smaller was for Berthier, the larger, the lion's share, for himself. The Emperor could recline in a dormeuse in front of his seat; but no such accommodation was afforded to his companion. In the interior of the carriage were a number of drawers, of which Napoléon had the key, in which were placed despatches not yet read; and a small library of books. A large lamp behind threw a bright light in the interior, so that he could read without intermission all night. He paid great attention to his portable library, and had prepared a list of duodecimo editions of above five hundred volumes, which he intended to be his constant travelling companions; but the disasters of the latter years of his reign prevented this design from being earried into complete execution (2).

Napoléon was extremely fond of exercise on horseback, and both a daring and indefatigable rider; but he was far from being a good horseman. He generally rode entire horses, and as he frequently had them little under command, those near him were sometimes thrown from their saddles by the effects of his awkwardness. Eight or ten horses for his private use accompanied the earriage, but the favourite was a beautiful Arab bay, with a black tail and mane. When he mounted on horseback to survey a country, two officers of his suite preceded him, and his own steed followed at a quick trot those which went before it. He usually held the reins in his right hand, and incessantly agitated the bit in the horse's mouth: peculiarities contrary to all the rules of the manège, but not a little characteristic of the incessant fervour of his mind. His restlessness of disposition was such, that he could not sit still, even when carried at the gallop on horseback. The officers who rode before had come by long habit to know so well what he wanted, that he had rarely to direct their course, but his own horse followed mechanically the direction which they took. He was passionately fond of riding across the country, through fields or woods, and over heaths; and in a difficult path where riding was hazardous, and the whole party was obliged to dismount and lead their horses, the Emperor was always in spirits. If he came to any place where a disaster had been incurred, or which was associated with painful recollections, he pushed on at the gallop, and fell into a perfect fury, if any thing then checked his progress. On one occasion, in the antumn of 1815, he had occasion to pass a place where seventy caissons, of great importance to the army, had been blown up the dry before by the Cossecks. On seeing the ground covered with the fragments, he immediately set off at the gallop, to get over it as fast as possible; and a little dog having followed his horse barking, he was seazed with such a fit of fury, that he drew one of the control of the con thus thrown away by his infuriated master (1).

The importance of the unceasing resilessness and indefatigable activity of his disponential of the unceasing resilessness and intelligence of the unceasing resilessness and intelligence of the unceasing resilessness and intelligence of the unceasing which is a different things were done, and the rigorous manner in which, other in nevertheless, instant obedience was enforced to his commanist in which is march of headquarters was delayed for some hours, or half a day, beyond the time fixed, while the Emperor was dictating or rending despatches; and at the last word he would deal out—"The earliage—to horsel".

These words acted like an electric shock to his attendants, who straightwy mounted, the carriage was instantly at the door, and the whole set off at the squadron of the guards on horschack. The whole pushed on at a quick trot, or the gallop, often for a day or a night without halling; and where the row as narrow, or a defile or cope was to be traversed, the velemence with which they rode drove them against each other, at the limithent hazard of their legs and necks. If the firmper halled to make an observation, he impediately mounted one of the led horses, and four chaseurs, with fixed hayonets on their carlines, formed a square round him, which advanced, always keeping him in its centre. If a distant object was to be examined, a page brought up the telescope, a very fine one being always at limit; the majes were frequently caffed for, and spread out on the ground, and the imperor, lying down upon them, was soon as completely absorbed in his plans as the hall begun his soluted at 8 t. chaud (2).

When the I mperor passed through a division of the guards, all fine to the bands of the regiments came to the front, the troops fill lack, and formed line on either side, and great point was observed; the need almost amounting to violence. The imperial suite, like a whirlwind, swept through the columns, too fast for the men either to fall late the ranks or present arms; and before the astonished crowd could find time to gare on their I cloved closel, the centifies was disappearing in the distance. Room, lowever, was always cleared, the outriders bondly called out to make way; and at the magic words—"The I imperiod" infaotry, cavalry, and artiflery were pell-mell lutries to the side, often in frightful confusion, and with fractures offers and arms. I out cleares never failed, to the very last, to greet his passage through the threads of the gards, by whom he was enthusiastically beloved, and whose wants were sedul only introduce to, but though the young conscipts, in the beginning of the campaign of $155, were problegal of the same architecture, yet hardship, distater, and suffering, seconly eooled their ardour and before its close the imperial suite often traversed long columns of the army; without a single cheer announcing its presence (4).

....

When despatches overtook the Emperor, as they often did; on the despatches on the road, Duroc, or Caulaincourt, who rode at the side of the carriage, received and opened the bag, and presented the letters to the Emperor without stopping. Directly a number of envelopes were seen falling from the windows of the imperial earriage; and it was evident, from the rate at which they were tossed over, that the letters were devoured with the rapidity of lightning. The useless despatches and covers were eut to pieces, and thrown out in the same way; often in such quantities, as to strew the track of the wheels with little fragments which, trodden under foot by the horses, or erushed under the wheels of the succeeding carriages, made a white line along the road. Napoleon generally cut these despatches to pieces with his own hands, or, if not so employed, worked ineessantly with the windowsash or earriage-door: he could not remain a moment at rest. If there were no despatches or morning states to read, he had recourse to the Paris journals, or the last publications of the day, with which the drawers of the carriage were always stored; but they generally shared the fate of the unimportant despatches, being thrown out of the windows after a few pages had been cut up. In such numbers were these discarded literary novelties thus tossed overboard, that the officers of the suite generally contrived to eollect no inconsiderable stores of diverting trifles, by picking them up on the traces of his carriage. The Emperor was insatiable for something new, and opened with avidity every fresh publication; but his taste was for solid and well-informed writings, not amusing trifles; and he had an incredible tact in discovering, from a few pages, whether there was any thing worth reading in a book, so that, in his hands, the ephemeral literature of the day disappeared almost as fast as it was introduced (2).

The antechambers of Napoléon during a campaign—whether in his tent, in the field, or in the apartments of farm-houses, or even cottages, which were dignified for the time with the appellation of "the palace"-presented the most extraordinary spectacle. No one could form an idea of the fatigue there undergone by the whole attendants, from the grand esquire Caulaincourt to the lowest of the valets. Duroc and he were themselves indefatigable, and, by unwearied exertion and extraordinary activity, had introduced the utmost degree of regularity into the imperial - household; but it was no easy matter for the strength of any others in attendance to stand the rigorous services which were exacted. Persons of illustrious birth or the highest rank—such as Count Narbonne or Caulaincourt -were obliged to wait there night after night, sleeping on straw or stretched out on chairs, ready at any moment to be called in by the Emperor. Now and then the scene was enlivened by a young and handsome actress in the last Parisian costume, who, amidst the din of war and the smoke of the bivouacs, waited to be ealled in to divert the Emperor for a few minutes amidst his more serious cases (5). Frequently he roused his attendants eight or ten times in the night when despatches requiring instant attention were reecived. All who were there on service slept habitually on straw, wrapt up in their cloaks, ready, at a moment's warning, either to mount on horseback and ride twenty or thirty miles without halting, or to take their turn, the moment the Emperor's voice was heard, in the not less fatiguing duty of answering his despatches, or writing to his dictation. So crowded was his antechamber in general with attendants, that it was not inaptly compared, by those inhabiting it, to the inside of the wooden horse of Troy. The faithful Rustan, whom he had brought from Egypt, usually slept near the door be dressed and undressed the Emperor; and when he rode out, was constantly at hand to bring the telescope, or provide the cloaks or umbrellas which the squares of the Old Guard Although this important apartment was overloaded with maps, military states, and despatches, the most remarkable and uniform regularity was observed in its arrangement, and it was so minaged, that, though the Imperor so often moved his headquarters, every thing was in the same place one day as another. In the middle stood a large table, on which was extended the best map of the theatre of war (2): and on it were stick pins, with heads of different colours, to represent his own and the hostile columns. It was the duty of the director of the topographic bureau, to have the map with these pins faid down the moment that headquarters arrived at any place; and almost always the first thing which Napoleon did, map when out on horseback, that Caulaincourt had a portable one, which he kept constantly used to his button across his breast, and he often was required to unfold it ten or lifteen times in the course of a forencon (5) unshin At the corners of the cabinet were four lesser tables, at which the distinct and the secretaries of Napoléon were engaged in writing; and sometimes happleon himself and the chief of the topographic department, were to be seen there likewise. The Emperor usually dictated walking about in his green surtont and great boots, with his hat upon his bead precisely as he was interred in the grave at St.-Helen. As his ideas flowed with extraordiuary tapulity, and he spoke as rapidly as he thought, it was no easy matter for his secretaries to keep pace with his allocution. To facilitate the tail of a dragon signified the I rench army, a whip, the corps of Davoist; a thorn, the Brittis empire, a sponge, the commercial towns. It was the duty of the secretares afterwards to decipier this chaos, and extend it in proper sentences, which was often a work of no small difficulty; but the I improper had a singular facility in making it out, as the symbols had been established by himself. Often there were two despatches to which answers were to be dictated at the same time—one from Spain, and another from a distint quarter of Germany; but the complication and variety of objects to be considered, made no confusion, on such occasions, in the steadiness of his mental gaze. The moment that a despatch was read, and its bearer questioned, an answer to it was commenced; and, not unfrequently, while the secretary in one corner was making out orders of the most important kind for the war in Spain, the one that sat in another was drawing a diplomatic note; a third busy with the orders for twenty brigades; and the fourth with an ABC for the King of Rome (1). Nothing could exceed the distinctness with which the threads of all these varied subjects were preserved in his mind, and although the orders which he gave for the direction of distant operations were often unfortunate or erroneous, from the impetuosity of his mind leading him to decide without sufficient information, and their effect was still more frequently marred by the neglect or incapacity of inferior functionaries; yet they were always founded on an able and hicid conception on his part : and the very errors they contained, which sometimes were of the most serious kind, generally arose from the intensity of that conception rendering him blind to the opposite set of considerations (2).

⁽¹⁾ Odel. i. 174, 175. (2) Bausset, ii, 214. Odel, i. 145, 146.

⁽¹⁾ Olel I 131 135 Rauset, II 16"

One of the most important officers in the military household of tary portfolio Napoléon, was the keeper of the portfolio—a functionary who supplied the place of the whole tribe of registrars, keepers of archives, and state-paper officers, in ordinary governments; and who, though a simple Swiss porter, in the rank of a superior domestic, was intrusted with the keeping of papers of inestimable value. His duty was of the simplest, but at the same, for a long continuance, of the most exhausting kind: it was to be constantly at his post, and thoroughly acquainted with the place, arrangement, and look of all the papers under his charge: night and day he required to be at the door of the cabinet; no excuse but severe illness could be taken for even a minute's absence. The Emperor had with great pains, collected a magnificent set of maps, the finest probably in existence, which was his constant companion in the campaigns of Austerlitz, Jena, Friedland, and Aspern; but it was lost during the Moscow retreat, and its place was never afterwards adequately supplied. The collection, however, though of a secondary character, which was made for the campaign of 1815, was very considerable, and two officers of approved talent and fidelity were constantly in charge of it, and at hand. So peremptory were the orders of the Emperor that they should be constantly near his person with their portfolios, that they were never more than a few yards distant either from his cabinet, his carriage, or his charger; and, being well aware of the importance of their functions, and the numerous occasions on which they were required to produce their treasures, they rode over, without ceremony, every thing that came in their way. With such minute attention to details were the operations of this wonderful man conducted; and so vast the variety of information which required to be taken into account in the formation of designs, which to a superficial observer, appeared to emanate from the conceptions of original genius (5).

two serious papers on different subjects, much less three. Nevertheless, a man with an active mind may frequently he seen in a room with three secretaries, and keeping them all constantly employed, but in such a case the real mental strain is with one only; the others are making out letters from hints furnished, or writing routine despatches of little moment, or copying what is put into their hands, with possibly the addition of a sentence at the beginning and end.

ginning and end.
(2) Odel. i. 139. 141.
(3) Odel. i. 112, 111.

⁽¹⁾ It is frequently said, from several secretaries being engaged in the room at once, that Napoléon could dictate to three clerks at a time. This, however, is a mistake, as all those who have really been so hard pressed as to require to attempt it will readily believe. It is quite possible to dictate a serious paper to one secretary, and write a letter with your own hand, or dictate short notes, requiring little attention, at the same time; the eye giving the sense of what is written, while the memory retains the import of what has been dictated: but it is altogether impossible to dictate at the same time

Nanolesis Although no man m modern times has occasioned such a destruction of the human species, Napoléon was, often susceptible of pity man tyand restroint for individual suffering; and as he rode, according to his constant custom, over the fields of his victories after the carnage had ceased, he frequently made some of his suite stop to stanch the wounds, or alleviate the sufferings of the maimed, of whatever nation. On one occasion in Silesia, when riding in this manner over a field strewed with the wounded and the 1805, some English sailors exerted themselves strenuously to extinguish the flames in a sconer had this come to the knowledge of Napoleon, than he ordered them to be sent home to their own country, with money to carry them from his privy purse. After the battle of Bautzen, he had occasion to pass through the town of Bischoffswerda, which had become a prey to the flames during the preceding contest. The smouldering rulns, and starting inhabitants, striving to rescue some of their effects from the devastation, presented a most melancholy spectacle, with which the Emperor was deeply affected, provide the requisite funds from the military chest, the payment of this sum fell as a hirden on the King of Saxony (2). When he arrived at Buntzlau in Silesia, where his old antagonist hutusoff had breathed his last, he enquired ried into execution (5).

file gene Heroic conduct, whether in his own troops or those of his enemies, duet to a seldom failed to arrest his attention. On one occasion, at Boulogne, he received intelligence of a young English sailor who had escaped from his place of confinement in the interior of France, and made his way to the coast near that town, where he had secretly constructed a skill of branches and the bark of trees, with which he was about when seized to brave the tempests of the Channel, in hopes of making his way to one of the English cruisers, and regaining his native country. Struck with the hardshood of the project, Napoléon ordered the young man to be brought into his presence, and himself ducstioned him as to his motives for undertaking so perlious an adventure; for the bark seemed meapable of bearing the weight of a human being. The sailor persisted in his having intended to embark in it, and besought the Emperor to permit him to earry his design into execution "Doubtless," replied Napoleon, "you must have some mistress to revisit, since you are so desirous to regain your country?" No," replied the young man, "I only wish to see my mother, who is old and infirm " "And you shall see her," rejoined the I mperor, and immediately gave orders that the

in class hity, het peace was very far indeed from being a season of repose

to his mind. He was then incessantly engaged in the maze of diplomatic negotiations, projects of domestic improvements, or discussions in the council of state, which filled up every leisure moment of the forenoon. He rose early, and was engaged in his cabinet with his secretary till breakfast, which never lasted above half-an-hour. He then attended a parade of his troops, received audiences of ambassadors, and transacted other official business till three o'clock, when he generally repaired to the council of state, or rode out till dinner, which was always at six. When engaged in business, or at the couneil-board, his activity, as in his campaigns, was incessant; he could not rest a moment idle: at the head of the table of the council of state, he was eonstantly cutting the chair on which he sat with his penknife (1); and on his favourite desks at St.-Cloud, Fontainebleau, and the Elysée-Bourbon, where all his great designs were matured, the deep and innumerable indentations of his penknife are still to be seen (2). If he could get nothing else to work with, he bit his own nails to the quick, till the blood came. Dinner occupied exactly forty minutes: the Emperor conversed a great deal, unless his mind was much pre-occupied, but never indulged in the slightest convivial excess. Coffee succeeded at twenty minutes to seven, unless some special oceasion required a longer stay at table; and the remainder of the evening, till eleven, when he retired to rest, was engaged in discussions and conversation with a circle of officers, ambassadors, scientific or literary men, artists of celebrity, or civil functionaries. In their society he took the greatest delight. On such occasions, he provoked discussion on serious and interesting topics, not unfrequently morals, political philosophy, and history; and never failed to astonish his auditors by the extent of his information, and the original views which he started on every subject that came under discussion. A little talent or knowledge, doubtless, goes a great way with an Emperor; and suspicions might have been entertained that the accounts transmitted to us by his comtemporaries of the ability of his conversation were exaggerated, did not ample and decisive evidence of it remain in the memorials of St.-Helena, and luminous speeches, superior to any other at the council-board, which are recorded by Thibaudeau and Pelet in their interesting works on the Council of State during the Consulate and Empire (5).

In domestic life, Napoléon was exempt from the habitual influence of most of the vices which so often consume the time and father. If uence of most of the vices which so often consume the time and destroy the usefulness of persons in his exalted station. Though not a faithful, he was a kind husband: and his transient amours neither estranged him from the Empress, nor afforded any ground for public scandal. In early life, he indulged for a brief season in the dream of romantic love; and though his marriage with Joséphine was suggested by motives of ambition, her attractions soon acquired a powerful hold of his heart: his letters to her during the Italian campaigns breathe the ardour of devoted attachment; and to the end of his life, even after her divorce, she possessed a large share of his affection, and he in secret believed that her destiny was in some mysterious way interwoven with his own. Female blandishments never either absorbed his time, nor clouded his judgment. He was subject to terrible fits of jealousy, for which the levities and extravagance of Joséphine afforded too

^{(1) &}quot;I sat down in the arm-chair, all lacerated and cut up with the penknife, on which the Emperor used to rest."—Souvenirs de Caulaineount, ii. 44.

⁽²⁾ The author has repeatedly seen them.—See also Caulaincourt, ii. 14.
(3) Opinions de Napoléon dans le Conseil d'État

⁽³⁾ Opinions de Napoléon dans le Conseil-d'Etat par Pelei. Paris, 1833; and Thib. sur le Consulat. Paris, 1815.

much foundation; but he was unforguing in his disposition; and, though his moody temperament was wrought up on such occasions to the most violent formieness ' s life—state than could have been expected from one who was habitually guided by views of a goneral nature: while its ultimate disastrous effects afforded a signal proof that durable advantage, even in this world, is not to be nurchased by harsh or iniquitous measures (1) Though the Empress Marie-Louise was little more

cation and progress of his son occurried a large share of his attention, even on the most momentous occasions of his life (2), and one of the bitterest paugs which he felt during his exile at St. -Helena, was oning to his senaration from that beloved infant, with whom his affections and prospective glories had been indissolubly wound up (3)

To complete the character of this extraordinary man, it only remains to add, that his conduct at the time of his fall, and during his exile at St.-Helena, exhibited the same mixture of grandeur and littleness. of selfishness and magnan, mity, which characterized every other period of his life. History has not a more spleodid scene to record than his heroic though unsuccessful campaign in France in 1815; but he lost its whole fruit by the want of moral courage to prosecute his movement upon St -Dizier, and was content at last to abdicate his throne, and retire to a hitle apparage assigned him by the conquerors in the island of Elba llis friumphant return from thence to Paris in the succeeding year, seemed to have outdone all that romance had figured of the marvellous, and his genius never shope forth with brighter lastre than in the preparations which he made during the Hundred Days to renew the war, as well as in the conduct of the short and deci-safety by surrendering to a British mon-of-war. He bore his exile in St -lielena in general with praiseworthy equanimity, and his conversations in that sequestered isle will be admired to the end of the world, as extraordinary

Allies, would possibly have been cut short by the scaffold; and the general who had been recounting the greatest achievements in modern history, and the prophet who was piercing with his eye the depths of futurity, often found his screnity disturbed, and his reflection destroyed, by the appearance of an I nglish uniform attending him in his rides, or the omission in some one of his 1.5

> · robably be regarded . . . and by all deemed

⁽¹⁾ Bauset 1: 7.8

(2) See in particular bis con loct on receiving the (3) 1.1 Cares O Vests
(3)  I should have d od if not at Hoscow at ontra to it the hing of flown the execute before the latter at Waterlow —Loc Casty, vo. 70, 71 Lattle of Borodipo, - Acre, vici 203.

Importance to give a truer insight into the character of Napoléon, than the of the prepublic actions, embracing so great interests and fraught with such momentous consequences, which are scattered through its volumes. They could not have been introduced earlier, for the events had not then occurred to which many of them refer; nor later, for not an instant is there left for reflection amidst the crash which attended his fall. It is during this armistice alone, where the stream of events presents.

" The torrent's smoothness ere it dash below,"

that an opportunity occurred for collecting details concerning the character and habits of a man, who, for good or for evil, has for ever imprinted his name and deeds on the records of history.

Character of MURAT, King of Naples, Napoléon's brother-in-law, was also so remarkable a character during the whole wars of the Revolution that some account of his peculiarities seems desirable. So early as the battles of Millesimo and Montenotte, in 1796, he was Napoléon's adjutant, and by his intrepidity and daring contributed not a little to the triumph of that memorable campaign. It was by these qualities, as well as his handsome figure and dashing manners, that he laid the foundation of the reputation which gained for him the attention of the Emperor's sister, and by winning her hand led to his brilliant fortunes, and elevation to the throne of Naples. Nor was his merit in many respects inferior to his fortune. His piercing coun-d'ail; his skill in judging of the positions of the enemy; his chivalrous demeanour when leading his troops into hattle; his calm intrepidity in the midst of the most appalling dangers; his tall figure and noble carriage, as well as incomparable seat on the splendid chargers which he always bestrode, gave him the air of a hero of romance, not less than the character of a first-rate cavalry officer. At the head of his gallant cuirassiers he feared no danger, never paused to number his enemies; but with matchless hardihood threw himself into the midst of the hostile array, where he hardly ever failed to achieve the most dazzling exploits. In Napoleon's earlier campaigns at Ansterlitz (1), Jena (2), and Eylan (5), Murat was always at the head of so immense a body of horse as to render success almost a matter of certainty; and it was to the weight of this formidable phalanx, generally eighteen or twenty thousand strong, that the Emperor mainly trusted for the gaining, as well as completion, of his victories (4). But Murat's genius and daring in the field were equally conspicuous when he had no such superiority to insure the advantage. Napoleon's seuse of these qualities induced him to overlook his desertion of his post after the Russian retreat, and subsequent advances towards the Allies (5); and his heroic courage never appeared with brighter lastre than when he threw a last radiance over the victories of the empire at Dresden, and stemmed the torrent of disaster at Leipsic (6).

Lion in Palestine; the Parthians destroyed Crassus and Julian in Asia, and Napoleon himself at Masand Julian in Asia, and Araporeou mines. Cow; the genius of Cyrus sink under, that of Alexander the Great recalled hefore, the fortunes of Darius perished amidst, the Seythian cavalry; Hyder's horse all but drove the English into the Madras surf, and the English dragoons decided the fate of India at Assaye; a charge of French horsemen at Marengo placed Napoleon on the consular throne; another of the English light dragoons, on the flank of the Old Guard, hurled him to the rock of St.-lle-.

⁽¹⁾ Ante, v. 232.
(2) Ib. y. 363.
(3) Ib. vi. 37.
(4) "My decided opinion," said Napoléon, " is, that cavalry, if led by equally brave and resolute men, must always break infantry." An opinion contrary to that generally received, but supported by not a few of the most memorable facts recorded by histowy is all agreed which confirm foor why history in all ages, and which, coming from such a commander, who so well knew the value both of infantry and artillery, is well worthy of the most serious consideration.—See Las Casrs, vii. 184. It was by his cavalry that Hannibal conquered at the Ticino and Cannæ, and Napolcon at Austerlitz and Jena; the Asiatic horse arrested Richard Cour-de-

⁽⁵⁾ Ante, ix. p. 61. (6) Odel. i. 198, 199.

Hardbary Aspoleon had the highest opinion of Murat's military abilities, and believe the frequently consulted him upon the disposition of the troops, the mass fung of the ground, and the probable effect of any movements which were in contemplation. On these occasions, Murat, who had a great degree of military frankness in his manner, and whose near relationship to the Emperor enabled him to take thereties oo which no other would have ventured, spoke with remarkable decision and independence; and not unfrequently Caulamcourt, on whom known fidelity and true services had conferred an almost equal privilege, united with him in combating the most favourite projects of their cline. The habitual good-humour of the King of even in the most services.

these dangerous shoals, indence of the Emperor, and with reason, terminated; the momeet that diplomacy or civil transactions came on the tapis, Burat furned aside, or left the council-room, from conscious incapacity or insurmountable aversion, "the was a Paladin," said Appoleon, "in the field, but in the cabinet destitute either of decision or indigment. Ho loved, I may rather say adored me, he was my right arm, but without mo the was nothing. In battle, he was perhips the bravest man the world, left to himself, he was an imbecide without indement (1)."

The external appearance of Aspolon formed a striking contrast to that of his royal brother-in-law. When they rode together along striking the front of the troops, Minrat attracted universal attention hy his splendid in the front of the troops, and the striking of the front of the troops, Minrat attracted universal attention hy his splendid in the striking contrast to that of his royal brother in the striking contrast to the striking contrast to the striking contrast to that of his royal brother in the striking contrast to that of his royal brother in the striking contrast to the strikin istically,

with the three-cornered hat, dark surtout, leather breeches, lugo boots, corpulent figure, and careless seat on horseback, which have become immertal in the representations of Aspoleton. The imposing aspect of Burat was, however, weakened, rather than heightened, by the rich and fantastic dress which he wore. Bark whiskers on his face contrasted with piercing bline eyes; his alundant blick locks spread over the need, of a splendid Polish dress, open above the shoulders; the collir was richly adorned with gold broorde, and from a splendid grille of the same material hung a light sabre, straight in the blade, after the manner of the ancient Roman, with the luft set in drumonds. Wide pantaloons, of a purple or scarlet colour, richly embruedered with gold, and boots of yellow leather, completed this singular costimes, which resembled rather the gorgeous trappings of the melodrama, than the comparatively simple uniform of modern times (2).

But its greatest distinction was a large three-cornered list, surpulsary, mounted by a profusion of magnificent white ostrich feathers, content rising from a broad gold band, which enclosed besides a superb heron plume. His noble charger was set off with gorgeous bridle and stirrups, richly git after the Turkshi fashion, and enveloped in trapings of azure blue, the tint of the Italian sky, which also was the prevailing colour of his herons. Above this fantatice but dazzing attire, he wore, in cold weather, a magnificent pelisse of drit-green eshet, lined and fringed with the richest sables. When he rode beside Napoléon, labible after his simple fashion, in this theatreal costume, it appeared a hing mage of splendid folly contrasting with the naked majecty of thought. It was only in his own person, however, that Napoléon was thus sunde, his adeed-e-camp and suite were arrayed for brilliant uniforms, and every thing studiously attended to which could set off their lustre in the eyes of the army or people. And with whatever sentiments the fantastic magnificence of the King of Naples might be regarded on peaceful parades, they yielded to an involuntary feeling of respect when his white plume was seen, like that of Alexander the Great, ever foremost in the ranks of war, plunging into the thickest of the hostile ranks, regardless of the shower of cannon-balls for which it formed a never-failing mark; or when he was beheld returning from a charge, his sabre dripping wet with the blood of the Cossaeks whom, in the impetuosity of overflowing courage, he had challenged and slain in single combat (1).

NEY is another hero whose deeds shone forth with such Instre during the whole Revolutionary war, that a separate delineation of his character seems called for. Born on the 10th January 1769, in the same year as Wellington and Napoléon, in an humble station, the son of a common soldier who had served in the Seven Years'War, and who afterwards became a cooper, he raised himself to be a leading marshal of the empire. Prince of Moskwa, and won, hy universal consent, the epithet of the bravest of the brave. He was no common man who, even during the turbulence of the Revolution, rose in such a manner and acquired such an appellation. In early youth, at the age of fifteen, Ney had a presentiment, as most men reserved for ultimate greatness have, that he was destined to distinction; and in spite of all the tears of his mother, and remonstrances of his father, who had made him a miner, and wished him to remain in that humble sphere, he entered the army at Metz, on the 1st February 1787, as a private dragoon. His military air, address on horseback, and skill in the management of his sabre. attracted the notice of his comrades, and procured for him the dangerous honour of being selected to challenge the fencing-master of another regiment in the garrison, who had given a real or supposed insult to his corns. The commission was accepted with joy by the young soldier, the ground chosen, and the sabres crossed, when the whole party were seized by their officers; and as duelling was, then punished with death, it was with no small difficulty, and by the intervention of a long captivity only, that he was saved from the scaffold (2).

Ills overflowing
Counge and suspended duel was renewed in a secret place; and Ney, victorious, simple character. inflicted such a wound upon his adversary in the hand, that it disabled him from continuing his profession, and soon reduced him to poverty. Ney having afterwards risen to greatness, did not forget the adventure, nor the calamitous consequences with which it had been attended to his opponent; he sought him out, and settled a pension on his old antagonist. Like all men of real elevation of mind, he not only was no ways ashamed of, but took a pride in recounting the circumstances of his early life; and when some young officers, after he was made marshal, were descanting on their descent, and the rich appointments which they enjoyed from their families, he said, "Gentlemen, I was less fortunate than you; I got nothing from my family, and I esteemed myself rich at Metz when I had two loaves of bread on the table." When he was made marshal, a splendid party were assembled at his hotel, among whom were the chief dignitaries of the empire. Amidst

⁽¹⁾ Odel. i. 201, 203. O'Meara, ii. 76. Las Cas. Such was his passion for danger, that he used to challenge the Cossacks to single combat, and when he had vanquished them, he would give them their liberty, often accompanied by a gold chain, which he took from round his neck, or out of the richly jewelled watches which he always had on his person.—See O'Meara, ii. 96; and Siaur, Campagne de Russie, ii.

(2) Ney's Memoirs, i. 3, 4.

them all he made his way to an old captain, who stood behind the crowd at a respectful distance "Do you recollect, captain," said he, "the time when you said to me, when I gave in my report, "Go on, Ney, I am content with a marshal of France " Ibs

never informed of his tragic fate, the weeds of his family alone informed min 1815 that some mournful event had taken place he never again pronounced his name, and died twelve years after, at the age of a hundred, without ever having been informed of his end [1].

It m 1 m 2 The distinctive characteristic of Ney was his perfect calmness and character self possession in the distinctive characteristic of Ney was his perfect calmness and eible energy with which he pursued his formidable obstades with which he wa the onset of currassiers, even the terrib unable to deter his resolution, or disturb his steady gaze. When one of his unable to deter his resolution, or disturb his steady gaze. When one of his officers asked him, if on such occasions he never felt fear, "I never had time," was his simple reply. This extraordinary self possession in danger, accompanied as it was in his case with the practised eye which discerns the exact moment of attack, and measures with accuracy the probable resistance that may be anticipated, rendered him an invaluable auxiliary to a commander in-clinef, and when hapolforn, after his glorious march across the Dimeper, near Arsanoi, in 1812, said, "I have three hundred millions in the vanits of the Tuileries I would wilhingly give them all to save Marshal Ney (2)," he only expressed a sentiment which long experience of his vast services had suggested, and which the unexampled heroism with which he had headed the rearguard during the whole of that calamitous retreat had amply confirmed. It was when danger was greatest, and success most doubtful, that his courage was most conspicuous and his coolness most valuable, and if these qualities could have ensured success, Apoléon would have found titled and the reason to the hadden of the capacity in the last attack, headed by this heroic marshal, at Materiale (3).

Waterloo (5)
In the energy in the state of t

trials "1

his faculties." Notwithstanding his great experience, he never was able to comprehend, in complicated cases, the true-spirit of his instructions, and was indebted for many of his most important successes to the admirable eagacity with which his chief of the staff, deneral Jomun, divined the Emperor's process, and put his chief on the right course for their excention. It was the able counsels of this accomplished general that enabled Ney to complete the mestinent of Mack at Ulm, and his promptsuceour which extreated him from Impending run at Jena (4). The diverging directions which he gave to his corps had wellingly proved fatal to the French army in the mud of Pultus (5), and a clearer perception of the vital importance of the movement with which he was entrusted, might have re-established the throne of Napolion on the field of Bautzen (6). In separate command, he seldom achieved any thing worthy of his reputation, and, when placed under any other general than the

⁽¹⁾ Mismaires da Narichial (1) 10 (1) Aire v 193 20 (2) Ialo II 221 Course de 1112 Aux vii 20 (3) Aire vi 20 (4) Aire vi 20 (4) Aire vi 20 (5) Aire vi 20 (6) Aire vi 20 (6) Aire vi 20 (7) Aire vi 20 (7

Emperor, his unseasonable jealousy and overbearing temper were often attended with the most injurious results (1).

But these errors, serious as they were, affected his intellectual weaknesses, powers only; his subsequent vacillation on a political crisis, and unpardonable violation of his fidelity at Fontaineblean, and of his oath during the Hundred Days, have imprinted a darker stain on his memory, and prove that if his physical conrage was above, his moral firmness was below the ordinary average of human beings. Yet, even in that melancholy catastrophe, the reflecting observer will discover the grounds for individual forgiveness and general condemnation; he will contrast the weakness, under worldly temptation, of the brightest characters of the Revolution, with the glorious fidelity, under severer trials, of La Vendée, Saragossa, Moscow, and Tyrol; and conclude, that if the white plume of Murat was sullied by defection, and the glorious forehead of Ney stained by treason, we are to ascribe these grievons blots to the vices of the age in which they lived, rather than their own individual weakness: and conclude that the ntmost efforts of worldly greatness fall short of the constancy in misfortune which religion inspires, or the superiority to temptation which virtue can bestow.

Inferior to both these characters in the dazzling qualities of a of Berthler, hero, Bentuien was nevertheless too important a person in the military and civil administration of Napoleon to be passed over without special notice. He was so constantly the companion of the Emperor, and all the orders from headquarters emanated so uniformly from his pen, that it was at one period imagined that his abilities had contributed not a little to the imperial triumphs; but this impression, which never existed among those who knew them both personally, was entirely dispelled by the incapacity evinced by the major-general on occasion of the commencement of the campaign of 1809 in Germany, which brought the empire to within a hair's breadth of destruction (2). Nevertheless, though totally destitute of the vigour and decision requisite to form a great commander, he was not without merit, and possessed some qualities of incalculable value to the Emperor. He was the essence of order itself. Unwearied in application, methodical in habit, indefatigable in exertion, he was constantly ready to reduce into the proper form the slight hints of the Emperor. The precision, order, and regularity which he displayed in the discharge of these important duties, could not be surpassed. Night and day he was alike ready to commence the work of redaction; no amount of writing could fatigue, no rapidity of travelling disarrange, no pressure of despatchés perplex him. "This," said Napoléon, "was the great merit of Berthier; and it was of inestimable importance to me. No other could possibly have replaced him." The constant habit of associating with the Emperor, with whom, during a campaign, he dined and travelled in the carriage every day, necessarily gave him a considerable degree of influence, and the pretensions of his manner indicated that he assumed more than he possessed. "That was quite natural," said Napoléon; "nothing is so imperious as weakness which feels itself supported by strength. Look at women." Like almost all the creatures of his bounty, he deserted the Emperor in the hour of his distress, and made his peace with the Bourbons at Fontainebleau; but he did not survive long to enjoy the fruits of his defection, having perished in an ignoble manner by a fall from a window, in the year following, in the streets of Manheim (3).

⁽¹⁾ Ante, vii. 431. (2) Ante, vii. 124.

⁽³⁾ Las Cases, i. 357. Biog. des Cont., par Michaud, art. Verthier.

Deposate Great were the efforts made by the English cabinet to turo to the relations are best account the unhoped-for flood of good fortune which set in during the first months of 4815. It was hard to say whether the hoshed separate interests, and reconciled jarring pretensions, in the conclusion of the alliances of cabinets, was most worthy of admiration. Lofty and commanding, indeed, was the position of Great Britain in thus finding the continental states, after so long a contest, ranging themselves around her standard, and the jealousies of rival governments merged in the common and diplomatic difficulties of no ordinary kind awaited the statesman whose perseverance at length smoothed them all away, and comented, out of such discordant materials. the citorious fabrie of the Grand Alliand.

The decided step taken by Prussia in seceding from the French alliance, and uniting her fato to that of Russia by the treaty of Rusts Adisch, at ooce and without any formal convention re-established and from amicable relations between the cabinet of Berlin and that of London; and long before any diplomatic connection had been resumed between them, Immense supplies of arms, ammunition, and warlike stores of every description, had been forwarded from the Thames to the mouth of the Elbe, from whence they were disseminated through the whole Prussian dominions (4). To accelerate the conclusion of a regular treaty. Sir Charles Stewart, now the Marguis of Londonderry, was sent by the British government to the north of Germany early in April, and arrived in Berlin on the 22d of that month. Finding the hing of Prussia at Dresden, he instantly pushed on to that city; and there it was at once agreed upon, that England, in addition to the immense supplies of arms and military stores which she was furnishing with such profusion, should advance two millions sterling to sustain the operations of the Prince-Royal of Sweden in the portly of Germany; and a like sum to enable Russia and Prussia to keep up the vast armaments which they had on foot in the centre of Saxony, besides five hundred thousand pounds with which the British government charged itself as the cost of the Russian fleet. In return for these liberal advances, Itussia agreed to maintain two hundred, and Prussia one hundred thousand nich in the field, exclusive of garrisons; and on this basis matters remained till the conclusion of the armistice of Pleswitz (2).

Tresport Ao sooner, honeyer, a read and a ten con magical and 1, stat back be convention, from the provers turned their attention with Great Britain; and as both Sir Charles Stewart and Larl Catheart, the English ambassador at the court of St. Petersburg, were at the allich headquarters, a trenty of alliance, offense and defenses, was soon concluded

Passet By this treaty, signed at Reichenbach on June 43, the foundation was laid of the Grand Alliance which effected the deliverance of Europe 18 was stipulated that I righted should pay to Prussia, for the six remaining inputs of the year, a subsidy of L GOLLOG, in consideration of which the latter power was to keep in the field an army of 80,000 men. Two separate and important articles were inserted in the secret treaty. By the first of these, the British government engaged "to contribute its efforts to the aggrandizement of Prussia, if the success of the allied arms would admit of it, in such geographical and statistical proportions as should at least restore it to the situation in which it stood prior to 1806 (1);" while, by the second, the King of Prussia agreed to cede to the Electorate of Hanover a part of his possessions in Lower Saxony and Westphalia, to the extent of 500,000 souls, including, in particular, the bishopric of Hildesheim.

By another and relative treaty, signed the day after between Russia and Great Britain, it was stipulated that Great Britain should pay to its Emperor, till January 1, 1814, a subsidy of L.1, 555, 554, by monthly portions, in return for which he was to maintain 160,000 men in the field, independent of the garrisons of strong places. In addition to this, England took upon herself the maintenance of the Russian fleet, which had been in the harbours of Great Britain ever since the convention of Cintra in 1808 (2), with its crews, a burden estimated at L.500,000 yearly. And as these subsidies, great as they were, appeared to be inadequate to the daily increasing cost of the enormous armaments which the Allies had on foot, or in preparation; and, in particular, the want of specie, which was every where most severely felt, it was stipulated that an issue of paper, to the extent of five millions sterling, should take place in the Prussian states, guaranteed by the three powers, of which two thirds were to be at the disposal of Russia, and one-third at that of Prussia; the ultimate liquidation of the notes, which were payable to bearer, being fixed for the 1st July 1815, or six months after the conclusion of a definitive treaty of peace, and undertaken in the proportion of three-sixths by England, two-sixths by Russia, and one-sixth by Prussia. And although the treaty, by its letter, was to continue only during the year 1815, yet the high contracting parties, both in this and the Prussian treaty (5), agreed to concert anew on the aid they were to afford each other in the event of the war being prolonged beyond that period; and, in particular, "reciprocally engaged not to negotiate separately with their common enemies, nor to sign any peace, truce, or convention whatsoever, otherwise than by mutual con-

Convention of Peters. Waldau, on July 6, for the regulation of the Gerwaldau, July 6. Mussia, at Peterswaldau, on July 6, for the regulation of the German legion in the service of Russia. It was stipulated that the expense of this legion, which was to be raised to ten thousand men, should be undertaken by the British government, and, in return, should be placed at their disposal, and officered according to their recommendation. The estimated expense of each man was taken at L.40, 18s. overhead, including pay and provisions; a curious and valuable fact, as indicating the wide difference between the cost of military armaments on the continent and in this country, where the charges per head are nearly three times as great (4).

Convention of London of London regarding the issue of paper monty, sept. 30.

So excessive did the want of specie become in Germany, in the autumnal months of this year, from the enormous demands of the multitudes of armed men who were assembled within a narrow space on its surface, that England was again obliged to interpose its inexhaustible public credit to supply the deficiency. By a supplementary

⁽¹⁾ See the Treaty in Martin's Sup. xii. 571; and Aun. Reg. 1813; State Paper, 357; and Secret Articles in Schoell, x. 255.

⁽²⁾ Ante, vii. 379.

⁽³⁾ Ann. Reg. 1813, 355. State Papers, Martin, xii. 568. Schooll, 256.

(4) Martin, S. School, 9. 9. 9. 9. Ann.

Reg. 1813; Str

convention, signed at London on the 50th September, the government of Great Britain engaged to propose to Parlament a measure whereby bills of credit in favour of the Emperor of Russia and king of Prussia should be is sued by the English exchequer, to the extent of L 2,500,000, or 15,000,000 Prussian tbalers; one millioo to be put monthly into circulation, and payable in specie one month after the ratification of a general peace, at offices in such towns in the north of Germany as the British government, in concert with the courts of St. Petersburg and Berlin, should point out, with an option to the holders, instead of receiving payment in specie then, to fund them in a stock bearing six per cent. A similar treaty was, on the same day, signed with Prussia, which power obtained one—third of the proposed sum; the other two thirds being at the disposal of Russia. These stipulations were immediately carried into medium in German

the north of Europe A memorable lostance of the wonderful effect of national credit on lumin transactions, and of the inexhaustible resources of a coulorry which was thus able, at the close of a war of twenty years' duration, not only to formsh subsidies of vast amount to the contioental states, but to guarantee the circulation of their own dominions, ond cause its notes of hand to pass like gold through vast empires, extending from the Libe to the wall of China, which, but a few mooths before, had been orrayed in inveterate hostility against it (1).

With Sweden also, o treaty olready alluded to had been concluded beta-bloom at an earlier period, which in the end was attended with the most alluded to had been concluded beta-bloom and an arriver period, which in the end was attended with the most alluded to had been concluded beta-bloom and the first property, signed at Stockholm on the 5d blarch 1815, it was provided that the Knog of Sweden should employ a body of thirty thousand men, in concert with the Russian troops, in such operations os should be agreed on, in the north of Germany; in consideration of which the British government agreed to pay searly the sum of 1,400,000, by monthly instalments. Great British concerns a standard of Guadaloupe in the West Indies to Sweden, and Sweden promised to give the British subjects the right of corrept on the three harbours of Gottenberg, Carlsham, and Straisund Finally, the British government acceded to the convention already concluded between the ca-

Napoléon's system of transferring kingdoms and spoliating crowns, but, in answer to this, it is enough to observe that though Russia, prior to Napoléon's invasion, had been in amity with the cabinet of Demmark, yet that power had adhered to his standard when the war of 1812 commenced; and against Figland the Drussh court had been in a state of violent hostility ever since

for the great stringgle in which they were engaged, hapolton, on his part, had only one additional ally whom he gained, and that was Denmark, with whom a treaty, offensive and defensive, was concluded on the 10th July, at Dresden. The English government had made an ill-concerted attempt some time previously to compel the court of Copenhagen to join the Grand Alliance, and for this purpose a squadron appeared before Copenhagen, and demanded a categorical answer within fortyeight hours, under the pain of bombardment. This measure, which, if supported by an adequate force, might have been attended with the happiest effects, failed from the want of any military or naval force capable of carrying it into execution; and, shortly after, the treaty, offensive and defensive, was signed between France and Denmark. By this treaty, it was stipulated that France should declare war against Sweden, and Denmark against Russia, within twenty hours after the denunciation of the armistice, concur with all their forces to the common object, and mutually guarantee each other's possessions. This treaty secured to the French troops a considerable support at the mouth of the Elbe, and the aid of twenty thousand good troops—a succour of no inconsiderable importance, considering the advanced position of Marshal Davoust at Hamburg, and the importance of providing a counterpoise to the Crown Prince of Sweden in the north of Germany (1).

⁽¹⁾ See Convent on in Martine Sup via 5173 (2) And Peg 1813; Nate Popers, 216, Haitline and Sheeth, v. 201 222 and Aux. Beg 1813 Sup and 335 Schooth, v. 707 Valled Jepts 201

Importance Austria, however, was the important power which, in reality, of the posi-tion which held the balance between the hostile parties, and whose forces, hourly accumulating belind the Bohemian hills, threatened to pour down with irresistible force upon whatever party ventured to dispute its will. In physical strength, the Allies and Napoléon, as the indecisive result of the late battles proved, were very nearly matched. France, Bavaria, and the Confederation of the Rhine, supported by Italy on the one flank, and Denmark on the other, were superior in number of inhabitants and resources to Russia, Prussia, and Sweden; while the land forces of England were wholly absorbed in the Mediterranean and Peninsular contests. It was Austria, therefore, with her hundred and fifty thousand men, in the central salient bastion of Bohemia, which in reality held the balance; and it was hard for an ordinary observer to say to which side she was likely to incline; for, if the direction of the allied armies to Upper Silesia, and their abandonment of their natural line of communication with the Oder and the Vistula, indicated a reliance upon the secret favour of the cabinet of Vienna, the family alliance between Napoléon and the House of Hapsburg might be expected to lead to an opposite inclination; and it was difficult to imagine that the Emperor of Austria would be inclined in the end to push matters to such extremities as to endanger the throne of his own daughter (2).

Views of the Austria at this period were suffited as the ciently matured; and it was only the extreme circumspection with period. Which she carried them into execution that occasioned any doubt as to their tendency. Metternich, who at that period had come to acquire that direction of the cabinet of Vienna which he has ever since enjoyed, was too clear-sighted not to perceive the extraordinary advantages which fortune had now thrown in his way: and he was determined, if possible, to render them the means of regaining the lost possessions, and restoring the tarnished lustre of the Austrian crown. He was too well aware of the insatiable ambition by which Napoleon was actuated, as well as the warlike influences from within to which he was subject, to place the slightest reliance on the promises of moderation now so producally lavished by him; and he saw little proof of such a disposition in the determination openly avoned to avenge the defection of Prussia by entire extinction, and thereby render himself the undisputed master of Germany. By his advice, therefore, the bait thrown out of restoring Silesia to the House of Hansburg was refused; and the cabinet of Vienno came under engagements, conditional indeed, but sufficiently explicit to onthorize the king of Prussia to appounce publicly in his proclamation of 7th May .- "that in a few hours quother nower would four itself to the cause of the Allies." And although the unforeseen issue of the battles of Lutzen and Bantzen suspended this declaration, and three Savony, which was all but engaged in a similar policy, into the arms of France, yet, in truth, there was no variation of nurpose on the part of the cabinet of Vienna; on the contrary, they were only the more determined, on account of the near balance of the contending parties, to turn to the best occount their all-important functions as armed mediators. Not only the Illyrian provinces, but Lombardy and the Tyrol, were now openly talked of as restorations to be demanded; and the restitution of the Panal dominions, and dissolution of the Confederacy of the Rhine, as concessions to be strongly contended for. Still Austria was most anxious, if she possibly could, to avoid drawing the sword; and would greatly have preferred gaining these advantages by the weight of her armed mediation, than submitting them to the doubtful fortune of arms. But she was determined to appeal to that issue if her objects could not be otherwise gained; and these views were clearly ovinced in the choice she made of embassadors to send to the headquarters of the opposite parties; for Stadion, the avowed enemy of the French emperor, was despatched to those of the Allies, and Count Bubna, the declared advocate of peace, to those of Noneléan : while the Emperor Francis himself repaired to the castle of Getselien in Bohemia, to be near the theatre of the Important diplomatic negotiations, by which, to all appearance, the fate of Europe would be determiocd (1).

Little progress was made during the first three weeks of the ormistice in the work of negotiation Difficulties aroso from the very ontset as to the form in which, and the parties by whom, they should be conducted. The allied sovereigns were desirous that their plempotentiaries should not treat directly with those of France; but that both parties should address themselves to Austria os the mediating power; and this proposition was strongly supported by Prince Mettermelion the part of the cabinet of Vienna. To solve this difficulty, he came in person to Getschen, and an active correspondence there took place between him and Maret on the part of the French emperor. In the course of these letters, Maret strongly insisted for a categorical answer to the question, whether brance was to regard Austria as still its ally under the treaty of 14th March 1812? To this Metternich replied, that the duties of a mediator were howars inconsistent with those of an ally under the existing treaty; and therefore, that he at once agreed to a convention, to supply whatever was wanting in the original treaty, and strongly urged all the powers to send plenipotentiaries to Getselien to conclude a general pacification. It was at length agreed that, to preserve the independence essential to the due discharge of the duties of a i to the combit. . .

⁽²⁾ Maret to Mettern ch. 15 h Inne 1813. Hettern ch to Meert. 23th Jane 1313. Fain, is. 124, 129.

The next point upon which difficulties arose was the form in which the negotiations should be conducted; and upon this matter the variance was such, that Metternich repaired to Dresden in person, in order to arrange the basis of the proposed mediations with the Emperor, and discussions of the highest interest and importance took place between them. They were prolonged till past midnight, and have been preserved by Baron Fain, his private secretary, and bear all the stamp of originality and truth (1).

"You are welcome, Metternich," said Napoléon, as soon as he was introduced, "but wherefore so late? We have lost nearly a month, and your mediation, from its long inactivity, has become Jane 28.
Remarkable almost hostile. It appears that it no longer suits your cabinet to speech of the former, guarantee the integrity of the French empire: be it so; but why had you not the candonr to make me acquainted with that determination at an earlier period? It might have modified my plans, perhaps prevented me from continuing the war. When you allowed me to exhaust myself by new efforts, you doubtless little calculated on such rapid events as have ensued. I have gained, nevertheless, two battles; my enemies, severely weakened, were beginning to waken from their illusions, when suddenly you glided amongst us, and speaking to me of armistice and mediation, you spoke to them of alliance and war. But for your pernicious intervention, peace would have been at this moment concluded between the Allies and myself. What have hitherto been the fruits of your intervention? I know of none except the treaties of Reichenbach between Russia, Prussia, and Great Britain. They speak of the accession of a third power to these conventions; but you have Stadion on the spot, and must be better informed on these particulars than I am. You cannot deny, that since she has assumed the office of mediator, Austria has not only ceased to be my ally, but become my enemy. You were about to declare yourselves so when the battle of Lutzen intervened, and by showing you the necessity of augmenting your forces, made you desirous of gaining time. You have your two hundred thousand men ready screened by the Bohemian hills; Schwartzenberg commands them; at this very moment he is concentrating them in my rear; and it is because you conceive yourself in a condition to dictate the law that you have come to pay this visit. I see through you, Metternich; your cabinet wishes to profit by my embarrassments, and augment them as much as possible, in order to recover a portion of what you have lost. The only difficulty you have is, whether you can gain your object without fighting, or whether you must throw yourselves holdly among the combatants; you do not know well which of these lines to adopt, and possibly you have come here to seek more light on the subject-Well, what do you want? let us treat (2)."

Metternich's To this vehement attack, which embodied more truth than he reply. Was willing to admit, Metternich replied, with studied address. The sole advantage which the Emperor, my master, proposes, or wishes to derive from the present state of affairs, is, the influence which a spirit of moderation, and a respect for the rights and possessions of independent states, cannot fail to acquire from those who are animated with similar sentiments. Austria wishes to establish a state of things which, by a wise distribution of power, may place the guarantee of peace under the protection of an association of independent states." "Speak more clearly," interrupted the Emperor; "come at once to the point; but do not forget that I am a soldier who would rather break than bend. I have offered you Illyria to remain neutral, will that suffice? My army is amply sufficient to bring back the Russians and Prussians to reason all that I ask of you is, to withdraw from the strife " "Ab! sire," said Metternich, eagerly, "why should your majesty enter singly into the strife why should you not double your forces? You may do so, sire I It depends only on you to add our forces to your own Yes. matters have come to that point that we can no longer remain neutral must be either for you or against you "

1 7

At these words the Emperor conducted Metternich into a cabinet apart, the tables of which were covered with mans, and for some time their conversation could not be overheard. In a little, however, the voice of Nanoleon was again audible above its ordinary pitch "What! not ooly Illyria, but the half of Italy, and the return of the Pone to Rome, and Poland, and the abandonment of Spain, Holland, the confederation of the Rlune, and Switzerland! And this is what you call the sount of moderation t You are intent only on profiting by every chance which offers, you alternately transport your alliance from one camp to the other, in order to be always a sharer in the spoil, and you yet speak to me of your respect for the rights of independent states! You would have Italy, Russia, Poland, Sweden, Norway, Prussia, Saxony, and England, Holland and Belgiom in fine, peace as only a pretext, you are all intent oo dismembering the French empire! And Austria thinks she has only to declare herself, to crown such an enterprize I lou pretend here, with a stroke of the pen, to make the ramparts of Dantzie, Gustrin, Glogau, Magdeburg, Wesel, Mayence, Antwerp, Alexandria, blantua-in fine, all the stroog places of Europe, sink before you, of which I did not obtain possession but by the force of victories And I, obedient to your policy, am to evacuate Europe, of which I still hold the half, recall my legions across the Ringe, the Alps, and the Pyrenees, subscribe a treaty which would be nothing but a vast capitulation, and place myself at the mercy of those of whom I am at this moment the conqueror I And it is when my standards still float at the mouths of the Vistula and on the banks of the Oder, when my victorious army is at the gates of Berlin and Breslau, when in person I am at the head of three hundred thousand men, that Austria. without striking a blow, without drawing a sword, expects to make me subscribe such conditions! And it is my father-in-law that has matured such a project. It is he that sends you on such a mission! lo what position would he place me in regard to the French people? Does he suppose that a dishonoured and mutilated throne can be a refuse in France for his son-in-law and grandson? Ah! Metternich, how much has England given you to male war upon me (1)?"

This violent apostrophe was delivered while Napoleon, strongly Messenich excited, was striding up and down the apartment, and at the last insolting expression, which nothing in the character or conduct of the Austrian diplomatist could for an instant justify, the Emperor let his hat, which he held in his hand, fall to the ground Metternich turned pale, but without making the movement to raise it which his politeness would at any other moment have dictated, suffered him to pass and repass it several times, and at length the Emperor kicked it aside himself (2)

⁽¹⁾ Is a li 41 42 Hard x I 192 194
The authent circuid accuracy of this remainstallated verversation and anecdots I meetly rested only on Baron Islan account of the scene which attous, himself of the scene which attous, h worthy of all ered t from the character of the writer might be anyposed to be a little lufterneed by his eval at par all ty for the breach here in whose service be were but it is now entirely confirmed in every particular by the corroborat ng test mony of Lapab ar who derived he information from Nottern che himself—See Energe and II love de # 2 arope product (Emp + 2. 15)

(2) 1 a 2 1 43.

After a pause of some minutes' duration, during which not a word between passed on either side, Napoléon became more tractable, and revert-l'rince for a ing to fair words, contended only for a congress, which should congression tinue its sittings even during hostilities, in case they should recommence. A convention in consequence was agreed upon, by which it was stipulated that the congress should meet at Prague, at latest on the 5th July, and that Austria should procure the prolongation of the armistice to the June 30. 40th August. The convention set out with the Emperor of Austria's offer of his mediation, which was accepted by the Emperor Napoléon, "for a general or continental peace." By this means, Metternich gained a great advantage over Napoléon, inasmneh as he drove him out of his favourite project of a convention of separate powers to treat for peace, and won him over to the acceptance of Austria's mediation, which he had so much at heart, and which was so obviously calculated to augment the influence of that country in the approaching negotiations (1).

Nothing definitive, however, was as yet settled as to the intentions by both par- of Austria: she had gained her object of interposing her mediation between the helligerent powers; but it was uncertain to which side she would ultimately incline, and Metternieli had openly avowed, that if the French emperor would accede to the terms which she proposed, he would throw his whole two hundred thousand men into the seale in his fayour. But at this decisive moment, big with the fate of Europe and of the world, the star of England prevailed, and Wellington, with irresistible force, cast his sword into the balance. On the morning of the 50th June. on the evening of which day the convention with Austria was signed, Napoléon received by express the details of the Battle or Vittoria, by which a deathblow had been given to the French power in the Peninsula, and his armies had been swept as by a whirlwind from the north and west of Snain. It was not difficult to see, therefore, to what cause his ready accession to the convention had been owing. Metternich had no sooner regained the Emperor of Austria's headquarters, than he also received the same important intelligence, which was followed a few days after by the most complete proof of the decisive nature of the victory, in the announcement that, six days after the battle was fought-viz. on the 27th June-not one man of the seventy thousand who there combated under the standards of Joseph remained on the Spanish territory (2).

Great and decisive was the influence which this immense achieves ment exercised on the conferences at Prague. "Metternich," says of the negot tations. Fain, "could not fail to learn the details of this victory from the mouths of the English themselves, the moment he returned to Bohemia; and we shall soon see the fatal influence which it exercised on the progress of the negotiations." "The impression of Lord Wellington's success," says Lord Londonderry, "was strong and universal, and produced ultimately, in my opinion, the recommencement of hostilities." Nor is it surprising that the English and French diplomatists then on the spot, should thus concur as to the influence of this great victory on the issue of the negotiations. The Peninsular contest was now decided: it was no longer a consummate general maintaining with inferior means a painful defensive conflict, but a victorious chief at the head of the military force of three nations, who, after expelling the enemy from the soil which they had polluted, was preparing to cross the frontier, and carry his triumphant standards into the heart of France A hundred thousand men, assembled round the standards of Wellington awaited only the fall of the frontier fortresses to descend like a torrent from the Pyrenees, and inundate the valley of the Garonne. The charm of Nanolion's invincibility was at an end; disaster had overtal en his arms alile in the south as in the north of Europe; no snows existed to extenuate the last columnty and the only question Austria had to consider was, whether she should voluntarily ally herself to a sinking empire and a falling eause (4).

ole frontier

Soult is sent Fully impressed with the magnitude of the disaster, Napol/on took immediate and vigorous steps to arrest it. Aware that the designon among his generals had been one great cause of the loss of the Doning sula, he immediately sent for the ablest of his marshals. Soult, and disnatched him to the theatre of war in the Pyrenees, with full nowers as " hentenant of the Emperor," and instructions to defend the passes of those monntains to the last extremity; while, at the same time, orders were dispatched to Suchet to evacuate Valencia, and fall back behind the Ebro into Catalonia. Thus, on all sides, the vast fabric of French power in Spain was crumbling into ruins, a single deathblox on the decisive point had sufficed to lay the huge edifice (2), painfully raised during five successive years, and by fifty victories, in the dust.

Repoleon From this moment all prospect of peace was abandoned; the for mar views of both parties were mainly directed to war, and the negotiations at Prague n ere used but as a cover, on both sides, to gain time for 7777 A 4 ss after the -Cyr set out passes into Bohemia, and report upon the forces necessary to guard them, and the amount of the enemy's troops which were collected within the mountain screen. Meanwhile, the Emperor in all directions made the most vicerous preparations for the resumption of heatilities. Making Bresden his headquarters, he was incessantly occupied in inspections of the fortifications of that city and the adjoining forts, reviewing the numerous corps d'armée which were now assembled in its vicinity, or corresponding with the different marshals who were stationed so as to maintain the line of that river from the Roberman mountains to the sea. One day he went by Torgan to Wittemberg, reviewing troops and inspecting the fortifications at both places, the next he set out by Dessau for Magdeburg, and thence returned by Leipsie to Dresden. On another occasion he minutely inspected the fortifications of Acquistion, and the famous intrenched earn of Pirna. of which the mouldering lines were renovated and strengthened. Such was his activity, that he not unfrequently made a circuit of seventeen or eighteen leagues on horseback, or in his carriage, in a single afternoon. When not himself inspecting the environs of Dresden, he was constantly poring over the map, with his battahons of many coloured pins placed in almost every concervable situation, sometimes in the Bohemian passes, sometimes in the Saxon plains, so that it was hardly possible that hostilities should take place on any ground with which he was not acquainted, or under any These minutes investigations were preliminary to a design which Appoléon had profoundly conceived, and which he most ably carried into execution, of combination which he had not considered (5).

His plans of making Dresden the centre and pivot of his defensive line on the page, and Elbe, and of taking his last stand there for the empire of Germany. measures for the de. The situation of the ground in its environs was eminently favourable to such a design. The Elbe, in issuing from Bohemia, makes its way into the Saxon plains between two huge rocks, which restrain the course of the river and master its direction. Their summits overlook the whole valley in which the river flows: that on the right bank is named the Lilienstein, that on the left the Konigstein. These two immense piles of stone may he regarded as the advanced sentinels of Dresden. On the Kænigstein was already placed a fortress of the same name, which was altogether impregnable to open force, and at its foot stands the camp of Pirna, to which the wars of the Great Frederick had given immortality. On the opposite rock, the Lilienstein, works were established which communicated by two bridges with the opposite fortress, and the two together were intended to command the defile, and cover an intrenched camp for sixty thousand men. The lines of defence at this point extended from Gieslinhel across to Stolpen, the ancient citadel of which, built on the flat summit of the basalt, was strengthened with additional works; and the bridges which they commanded served as a communication, not only between the opposite fortresses, but between the armies on the right and left bank in Silesia and Lusatia. The traveller in the places now described, will recognise the well-known features of those magic scenes. where, amidst awful precipices, sable forests, sounding entaracts, and spacious streams, he regains in the heart of Germany the images and the enchantment of Alpine solitude (1).

Nor was it only at the great mountain-gate from Bohemia into Saxony that the care of the Emperor was bestowed; Dresden itself was the object of his anxious solicitude. Being but imperfectly fortified, the gaps in its walls were filled up hy ditches and palisades, which completed the circuit: the mouldering masonry of the old bastions was repaired, their ditches eleaned out and filled with water; while five large redoubts, connected together by strong palisades, were constructed further out. the fire from which intersected the whole intervening space, and rendered it impossible to approach the town till part of them, at least, was taken. The value of these redoubts was strongly felt in the campaign which followed: they saved the French army from a death-blow within a few days after the resumption of hostilities; and so anxious was the Emperor for their completion, that fifteen thousand peasants, conscribed from all parts of Saxony, were, during the armistice, employed constantly on them night and day. All the fortresses lower down the river were, in like manner, put in the best possible state of defence; cannon mounted on all their embrasures, and stores and provisions for a long siege laid in by convoys from France, and remisitions from all the adjoining country. Hamburg, in particular, which formed the last of this iron chain stretched along the Elbe, was strengthened with additional works, its old rampart repaired and its ditches cleaned out; while, under the able direction of General Haxo and Colonel Ponthon, new outworks were formed to a considerable distance round the walls, which carried the axe of desolation through the charming gardens and villas which had so long constituted the delight of that luxurious people. But their tears and entreaties were alike unavailing; the rising redoubt ploughed equally through the scenes of festivity and the abode of joy; the disconsolate owners, turned adrift on the world, were ridiculed when they sought indemnification: while the methodical genius of Marsbal Dayoust, always fully alive when money was to be extorted from a suffering people, contribed, during the six months of his occupation, to extract such immense sums from this industrious commnmity, as would have been reckoned impossible by the generals of any other nation, and nassed as fabulous in any other are but that which saw the arts of extortion brought to perfection by the generals of the brench Besolution (4)

⁽¹⁾ Témoin oculaire. Odel. ii. 141. Fain, ii. 20, 23. Personal observation.

176

Strength of By these means, though at the expense of an enormous amount th s l ne of of human suffering, a very strong line of defence was obtained on the Elbe. From the rocks of Koenigstein to the fields of Hamburg, a line of fortresses extended, some of the first order, others of inferior strength, but all calculated to impede the motions of the enemy, and afford to Napolcon the mannreciable advantage of transferring the seat of his operations at nleasure from one bank to the other Koenigstein, Dresden, Torgou, Wittensberg, Magdeburg, Hamburg, formed a line of formidable fortresses on the Elbe, of all of which he was master, while Merseberg, Erfurth, and Wurtzburg composed his chain of fortified nosts to the Rhine Erfurth, in particular, which lay in the centre of and commanded the main communication with France, was the object of his principal solicitude large stores of provisions were already accumulated within its walls, and its rocky entadels assumed

of the Elbe, he was alternately preparing for a desperate defensive warfare on the Saxon plains, meditating a hostile eruption into the sands of Prussia, and taking measures for an eventual retreat to the banks of the Rhine

The magnitude and vigour, however, of the Emperor's preparan a net those plans in the tions on the Elbe, elearly exinced to both his generals and soldiers his determination to make that river the base of a designate defensive struggle, and gave rise to much discussion, and many sinister presentiments in the army Defensive warfare does not suit the genius of the French soldiers, and it accordingly has rarely, if ever, succeeded with them Murmi plan of operations to the allied forces.

reverse Is the Emperor about to expose lamself to be cut off from France? Instead of so barardous a project, would it not be more prudent to collect out

(1) Olel i 225 Fain 11 21 tents for Derpurt to and the merchand to the pring harm tier of a contribution of 40,000 000 fr. and morable property of every description that garrisons from the Oder and the Elbe, leave those on the Vistula to their fate, and, with all the troops which can be collected, retire to a defensive position on the Saale, and if necessary to the Rhine? Serious losses indeed will be inenried by such a system, and a cloud be thrown over the star of the empire: but can it any longer be maintained in its former brilliancy, and is it not better to lose a part than endauger the whole (1)?"

These representations came from too respectable quarters, and were in themselves too much founded in common sense, to permit the Emperor entirely to disregard them; and therefore he laboured, in conversation with his marshals, to explain the grounds connected with the peculiarity of his situation, and the general interests of his empire, on which his plan of operations was based—"It is quite true," said he, "that you should not lightly hazard your line of communications—every tyro in the military art knows that; but at the same time, when great interests are wound up with the maintenance of a particular position, it must often be maintained at all hazards: we must have courage to apply the torch to our vessels. What would the defensive system which you advocate reduce us to?-losses greater than would result from the loss of ten pitched battles. We now require a complete triumph. The question is no longer the abandonment of such or such a position: our political superiority is at stake; the enemy would reduce it, and on it our existence depends. Are you afraid I shall be too much in the air in the heart of Germany? Was I not in a position still more hazardous at Marengo, Austerlitz, and Wagram? From Arcola to this day, all the important steps I have taken have been hazards of that description, and in so doing I have only followed the example of other illustrious conquerors (2). If the enemy debouche from Bohemia in my rear, it will be precisely in order to compel the retrograde movement which you would have me voluntarily undertake. I am not in the air in Germany, when I rest on all the strong places of the Elbe.

"Dresden is the pivot on which all my operations will turn. From Berlin to Prague, the enemy is disseminated over an immense circle, of which I' occupy the centre; his corps must make immense detours to concentrate. whereas mine, moving on an interior line of communication, will not have half the ground to go over. Wherever I am not in person, my generals must learn to wait for me, without committing any thing to hazard. Do you suppose it likely that the Allies will be able, for any length of time, to maintain the unity requisite for such extended operations? And may not I reasonably expect, sooner or later, to surprise them in some false movements? They will throw detached parties between the Elbe and the Rhine. I expect it-I am prepared for it. Independent of the garrisons of the fortresses on that line-Mayence, Wesel, Erfurth, Wurtzburg-Augerau is collecting a corps of observation on the Maine. Should they have the audacity to interpose in force between our fortified lines on the Elbe and the Rhine, I will straightway enter into Bohemia; and it is I who will threaten their rear. A few Cos-

⁽¹⁾ Fain, ii. 25, 26. (2) "Did Alexander, Hannibal, or Casar, occupy themselves about their line of retreat, when the moment had come to combat for the empire of the world? And what would have happened if Alexander had been beaten on the Indus, or Hannibal at Cannae, or Casar on the promontory of Dyrrachium? In the campaign of 1805 I was about to have Prussia in my rear; I was engaged in the depths of Moravia; retreat across Germany was impossible; but nevertheless I conquered at Austerlitz.

In 1806, when my columns entered the Thuringian forests, Austria was marching on my communica-tions, and Spain was about to cross the Pyrenecs; but I conquered at Jena. In 1809, when I had to contend with the waves of the Danube, Hungary and Tyrol were insurgent on either flank, and Prassia was preparing to descend to Franconia, and the English menaded Antwerp; but still I conquered at Wagram."—Narolúns m Moarwolos, il. 11; and Las Cases, iii. 128, 129.

sacks, it is true, may insult our departments bordering on the filline; but the National Guard will suffice to repel them, and the transference of the seat of war to the gates of Mayence would be attended with consequences of a very different description. It is very natural that the Saxons should be desirous to remote the war from their territory; but is it our interest as Frenchmen to re-celo their complaints? It is in the Saxon plans that the face of Germany.

lated every thing; fortune must now decide the event However good my lated every thing; fortune must now decide the event. However good my reasons may be, I know that I shall be judged of according to the event; it is the rigorous law of instory (1).

Forced It was not surprised that the Emperor entertained such as onin-ion on his chaoces of success in the position which he held at Dresden, for the forces which he had accumulated for its defence were immense. By yast efforts, the conscripts and reserves had been so completely brought up to the Elbo, that the army ready to recommence hostilities was raised to four hundred thousand men, of whom nearly three hundred and fifty thousand were effective, and present with the earles (2). This immonse force carried with them no less than twelve hundred and fifty pieces of cannon of which two hundred were the redoubted artillery of the Guard. in the finest possible condition. The caissons were all replenished, vast military stores collected, and the materiel of the army, generally speaking, in good, that of the Guard in the most admirable, order. The cavalry was the only arm which was deficient . that of the reserve, under Murat, was only thurs thousand, the light horse attached to the different corns, lifteen thousand men. Nor was money wanting; the vaults of the Tuileries had noured forth their vast treasures with seasonable profusion; the whole corps of the army had received their pay, and ample funds existed to carry on the prodlgious fortifications which were every where to progress to render the line of the Elbe impregnable to the forces of combined Europe (5).

Rew mes It was by unheard-of exertions, and wringing out of the country mere dies its last resources, however, that so vast a force hail been concentiated by trated for the defeosive by the rest of the decisive nature of Emperor spared no efforts, either of every spared no efforts, either of every spare and bayonet into the field. The frequent desertion of the conevery same and unmerous acts of heence and pillage which attended their line of march, induced him to prepare an entirely new set of regulations, which were rigidly enforced, for restraining these disorders, and foreing on the refractory or reluctant levies to theseene of action. Every conserpt, from the

(1) Fast, ii 29 21
(2) There names are acceptanced in an author's consumer, and on the hest possible exclusive, and continuously, and continuously applied hauself at that per ed with the marchite commanding his arms to the fast #1th Augest 1131 be wrote to Blankall 54 Cyr.—"The army of Emitties, in Stream 1130 con 1100/20 Stream [1-2] Cyr.—"The army of Emitties, in Stream 1130 con 1100/20 Stream [1-2] Cyr.—"The army of Emitties, in Cyr.—"The army of Emitties, in Cyr.—"The army in Emitties, in Cyr.—"The army in Emitties, have 1000 as part of the Gaard which is 30 col. For a stream, and in adhament have 1000 as part of 1000 as the 1000 as the 100 and 100 arms, and in adhament have 1000 as the 100 as the 100 arms, and in adhament have 1000 as the 100 arms, and in adhament have 1000 as the 100 arms, and in a supplied to the 100 arms and 100 arms.

Hamburg; 12 Torgan and Watemberg are 20 000 It is clear that 400 000 mer sent ng on puch a cha of of fortering or that of the File, ond which may, at 3 leasure, debonche by Dresden, Torgan Watem 1813.] 179 moment he was clothed and armed, was considered as disposable, and treated accordingly. The moment he was drawn, the young soldier was hurried off to the depôt, arrayed in uniform, armed, and that very day his military instruction commenced. As soon as a hundred were assembled, they were marched off, under the orders of a captain, to the headquarters of their regiment, and taught the manual and platoon exercise while walking along the road. Other companies were directed to the same line, and, as fast as they met, united together, so as to form a battalion of march; and these battalions again joined, so as to form a regiment of march. Before crossing the Rhine, these troops were formed into columns of march, over the formation and organization of which the veteran Marshal Kellerman, stationed at Mayence, presided. The most rigorous discipline was enforced upon these moving columns; and though it was inadequate to prevent dreadful disorders, consequent on the passage of such a multitude of young men just emancipated from the restraints of parental discipline, yet it augmented to a surprising degree the number of efficient soldiers who made their appearance round the eagles of the regiments. All these columns of march were directed to Dresden, where the Emperor received daily returns of the accessions of strength which his army was receiving; so that he knew the exact force on which he could rely. No sooner was this return made than the column of march was dissolved, and the conscripts of each regiment, under the direction of its own officers, took the route for the regimental headquarters (1). With such rapidity were the military formations and discipline thus acquired, that a regiment was reviewed by the Emperor, and made a respectable appearance, on the 20th July at Dresden, which had only been embodied in France on the 27th May. Aspect of Dresden at this period. as well as the continued residence of Napoléon, who, during the armistice, constantly had made it his headquarters, entirely altered the aspect of that charming city. If you east your eyes on its palisadoed trenches —on the girdle of redoubts which encircled its walls, on the hosts of pioneers who cut their way through its smiling gardens, on the formidable batteries which arose, as if by magic, around its environs, and the innumerable camps which covered its lovely hills-it was hardly possible to conceive whither the peaceful Saxon capital had fled. Nothing was to be seen on every side hut long columns of troops, trains of artillery, and endless files of chariots; while the rich and varied uniforms of officers on horseback, riding to and fro, bespoke the incessant activity of the chief by whom the immense multitude was ruled and directed. But in the interior of the city things still wore a pacific aspect. The multitude of French officers, indeed, and civil functionaries, who were there established, had given an entirely foreign air to the capital. German sign-boards were generally displaced by French; Parisian costumes and articles of ornament were to be seen on every side; the theatres were filled with actors and actresses from the Theatre-Français, or Opéra-Comique; the hotel-keepers and sellers of military maps reaped a rich harvest; and, what was not less characteristic of French habits, the multitude of ladies of pleasure, who resorted thither from all quarters, was so great, and the gains they made so immense, that despite the well-known extravagance and improvidence of that class, their expenditure could not keep pace with their receipts, and numbers, in a few weeks, realized fortunes which rendered them independent for the rest of their lives (2). Extravagance, profusion, and licentiousness, universally prevailed; and even the proverbal honesty of the Savon chracter was fast giving way under the accumulated temptations which the presence of such prodigious bodies of foreign troops necessarily induced. But the progress of this moral gangene was concealed under a still splendid exterior. The listless, indolent groups of officers who thronged the coffee houses, lounged through the shops, or adorned the theatres, the multitudes of superb hieries which were to be seen in the streets, the splendid equipages which were driving in every direction, and the crowds of richly dressed functionaries, who every morning attended at the levees in the palace—bespoke the mighty monarch, still, from his central capital, giving the law to the half of Europe (1).

D pos on This vost force, which, by such extraordinary efforts, Napoléon of Napo lean of leated together, was disposed after the following manner in Germany Twenty five thousand Bavarians, stationed at Munich, observed the threatening masses of the Austrians, of equal strength, who were collecting in the neighbourhood of Lintz, twenty thousand conscripts, for the most part almost entirely mexperienced, were collected, under Augerean, at Wurtzburg and Damberg, Davoust occupied Hamburg, at the extreme left, with twenty five thousand French, and fifteen thousand Danes, Oudmot, with eighty thousand, was stationed in front of Torgan, on the road to Berlin, to watch Bernadotte, who, with ninety thousand men, covered that capital, while two hundred and thirty thousand, divided into eleven corps, or fortythree divisions of infantry, and eighteen divisions, or four hundred and twenty nine squadrons of cavalry, were under the immediate orders of tho Emperor, and cantoned from Dresden to Liegnitz, with a corps, under St Cyr, to observe the passes into the Bolicmian mountains. This was independent of thirty five thousand men, of various nations, who were as sembled, under Rapp, at Dantzie, and the garrisons on the Elbe and Oder, in all eighty thousand combatants. But they were out of the sphere of operations, and could only be reckoned available by withdrawing an equal force of the enemy from the field (2)

D plomb e. The situation, meanwhile, of the garrisons, who were in a manner they were surrounded, was such, that it was impossible to expect that they could much longer hold out for the I rench crown. The stores which Dantzie contained were immense, but such was the situation of its defenders, that they were hardly able to make any use of them A hundred and twenty thousand stand of arms, twelve nulhous of francs in specie, and five-and twenty millions worth in grain and military clothing, constituted a prize to the conqueror, which it was alike impossible to abandon, and hopeless, in the end, to defend, from the condition of the garrison, not withstamling its still formulable numbers. Five-and thirty thousand men composed of two-and twents different nations, had there taken refuge after the calamities of the retreat but they were not only in part mutilated by the severity of the cold, but almost all so extenuated in body and decressed in mind, from the unexampled horrors from which they had escaped, as to be men able of any active exertion. They brought with them, moreover, in common with those who took refuge in Thorn, Wittembers, Torgin, and all the fortreses which opened their pates to the furthers of the trant timy after the Moscow compairs, the seeds of a dreadful typhus fever, the la-distribute Orient for increase at 1 couper 1 (1, 3 de for 33 7 no noch (VI 31) de no no credit et toucepe 1 til 13 replace a se préfére a no no (3) des rots 2 les la norma for cour (11) Uses 1 (18)

variable attendant on wide-spread suffering, whether from civil or military causes; and which, spreading with frightful rapidity, from the crowded quarters in which they were huddled together, and the total want of hospital stores, linen, or medicines for their use, soon cut off nearly a half of the whole soldiers assembled. Thorn had already succumbed, from these causes rather than from the artillery of Barclay de Tolly, who, with the Russian reserve, had been entrusted with its siege, and compelled it to capitulate, with eighteen hundred men, before a practicable breach was made; Spandau, with a garrison of three thousand, and immense military stores, was surrendered on the same terms on the 24th; and Czentoschau in Poland, with nine hundred men, on the 22d. Dantzic, indeed, still held out, and with the whole fortresses on the Oder, Stettin, Custrin, and Glogau, as well as Modlin and Zamose on the Vistula, yet hoisted the tricolor flag (1); but their garrisons, weakened by disease and misery, were long unable to undertake any offensive operation, and nothing but the continued blockade of the landwellr, by which they were invested, was requisite to make the fifty thousand veterans they contained, surrender eventually to the allied arms.

Preparations of the Allies of the Allies during the ening his army during the interval afforded by the armistice, the ening his army during the interval afforded by the armistice, the ening his army during the interval afforded by the armistice, the ening his army during the interval afforded by the armistice, the ening the ening his army during the interval which their people were animated, that they gained much more during that interval than their opponents; and it is to this accession of strength, more perhaps than any other eanse, that the extraordinary and decisive success, which they so soon afterwards obtained, is to he ascribed.

The first care of the allied sovereigns, after the conclusion of the campaign fixed at Trachenarmistice, was the arrangement of a general plan of operation for the conduct of the campaign; and in this important part of their duty, they displayed equal judgment and ability. The general principle laid down was, "that the allied forces should always be directed in strength to the quarter where the principal forces of the enemy were, assembled." As a consequence of this, the detached corps which were destined to act on the rear of the enemy, should always move as directly as possible upon his line of communications. "The greater part of the allied forces were to he accumulated in the salient angle of Bohemia, which appeared eminently calculated to enable them to turn with facility in whatever direction their services were required. In pursuance of these plans, the following operations were agreed on. Part of the allied forces, fifty thousand strong, were to be left in Silesia to check the operations of the enemy in that quarter, but with orders not to hazard'a hattle. One hundred thousand Russians and Prussians were directed to move, some days before the expiration of the armistice, by the roads of Landshut and Glatz to Jung-Buntzlau, and Budyn in Boliemia, to join as rapidly as possible the Austrian army, and augment the allied force in that quarter to two hundred, or two hundred and twenty thousand men. The army of the Prince-Royal of Sweden, leaving a corps of twenty thousand men to observe the French in Hamburg, was to assemble, in number about ninety thousand men, in the environs of Treinenbrutzau, hefore the expiration of the armistice, pass the Elbe between Torgan and Magdeburg, and thence move on Leipsic. The remainder of the allied force in Silesia, estimated - at fifty thousand men, was to approach the Elhe, taking care to avoid a general action, and strate to pass that river between Torgau and Dreeden, so as to unite to the army of the Prince Royal of Sweden, which by that means would be raised to one hundred and twenty thousand combatants (1)

⁽¹⁾ Hard. xii. 113, 114. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 27, 28.

"In the event of circumstances rendering it indispensable to reinforce the allied army in Bohemia, before the army of Silesia could effect its junction with that of the Prince-Royal of Sweden, then the army of Silesia was to march forthwith into Bobemia The Austrian army, united to the allied forces, shall debouche from Boltemia either into Saxony, Silesia, or towards the Danube, as circumstances may require Should the Emperor Napoléon, in order to anticipate the allied army in Bohemla, march against it, in the first instance the army of the Prince-Royal shall endeavour, by forced marche, to throw itself upon his rear and communications. On the other hand, if the Emperor Napoléon should direct his attack against the army of the Prince-Royal, the grand allied army is immediately to follow from Bohemia, to fill upon his communications, and give him battle. The general principle is, that the whole allied armies shall, from the outset, assume the offensive, and the camp of the enemy shall be their place of rendezvous. The Russian army of reserve, under General Benningson, shall forthwith advance from the \istula, and move by halisch upon the Oder, in the direction of Glogan, in order to be at liand, to act according to the same principles, and assist in the general attack upon the enemy if he remains in Silesia, or oppose his progress if he should attempt on meursion into Poland (2) "

Reflect of Sinch was the memorable plan of operations drawn up at Trackento a large Sweden, on the part of Russia, Prussia, and Sweden, and conditionally, in the event of her mediation failing, by thistria Thistory, perhaps, affords no previous example of operations so vast, diffused over so wide a circle, and carried on by armies drawn from such remote and apparently unconnected empires, being combined with such judgment, and executed with such ability and perseverance. Their required for their direction o rare degree of unanimity and prudence on the part of all the principal commanders, and could not prove successful unless carried into effect with the utmost zeal and unanimity on the part of the officers and soldiers of all the different nations employed Pangers of the most formidable kind awaited the combined armies, if my false step was committed, for they acted on the erconnference of an immiense circle, with a great river, wholly in the hands of the enemy, flowing through its centre, and in the middle by Amolton, re ting on sex fortresses, and at the head of three lumdred and lifty thousand effectivemen At no earlier period of the war would it have been practicable to have condined the armies of three monarchies in concentric attacks against an enemy of such strength, possessing such a position, and led by such a conmander, but times were now which changed from what they had ever previously been experienced evil had allryed the jealousies of calonets-univer-al suffering had roused the spirit of the people-and repeated defeats had given wisdom to the generals who led them Take Charles \II, Napoléon had taught his enemies how to I cat him, and a disaster greater than Pultona in aited him from the lessons which he had given them

The determination of the cal linet of Vienna lind been definitively taken at this period to join their firees to those of Russia and Prussia, if Napolion refused it e-sweeping reductions in the sunning which liteliterial in proposed

Determina. at the Dresden conference. It is proved by authentic state papers, that the motive which induced that astate diplomatist to propose cabinet of Vienna to the direct mediation of Austria in the end of June, and to urge the join the extension of the armistice till the 40th August, was to gain time for the landwehr and Hungarian insurrection to be brought up from the distant provinces of the monarchy, to make head against the immense forces which Napoléon had so unexpectedly brought into action on the Elbe (1). Metternich now declared, "that the Emperor Francis' determination was to support the cause for which the Emperor Alexander had made such noble efforts." Agreeably to this determination, the Austrian government was a party to the operations agreed on at Trachenberg; and July 12. Bohemia was, with her approbation, made the great salient bastion from which the forces of the coalition were to issue forth against the enemy. And, on the 27th July, when all hope of a pacific accommodation had vanished, and it had become evident, that, with both parties, the renewal of hostilities was only a matter of prudence and time, the Emperor Francis permitted the signature of Austria to be affixed to the secret article of the treaty of Reichenbach, which had been expressly reserved for his sanction by Count Stadion, and in which it was stipulated, that "in the event of Austria taking a part in the war, she should receive L.500,000 in bills upon London, and the like sum in military stores and equipments; that she should bring two hundred thousand men into the field, and be restored to the condition in which she was in 4805, or, at any rate, at the peace of Presburg, and that the Pope should be restored to his dominions." This clause had been drawn up under Stadion's eyes in the treaty between Russian, Prussia, and Great Britain, but without the direct authority of Austria; and the Emperor Francis long hesitated to sanction it; but at length, when all hope of peace had disappeared, he gave his consent on the 27th July, and thereby incorporated

Austria with the Grand Alliance (2).

Doubts recarding But although the accession of Austria to the league against Bernalotte. France, though not yet announced to the world, and still veiled under the dubious guise of armed mediation, removed the greatest source of disquictude from the allied sovereigns; yet they were not without serions uneasiness in another quarter. Although Bernadotte had not hitherto failed in any of his engagements, and his interests were evidently wound up with the maintenance of the Russian power in the north of Europe, from which

(1) lo a wilitary report by Prince Schwartzenberg to the Emperor Francis, dated 28th June, it was stated as a reason for prolonging the armistice—
"The Bohemian army would be not more than entirely complete on the 20th Juoc. The vast and unexpected preparations of France, reoder an iocreased amoament on the part of Austria necessary. Lacry unappropriated regiocut of the line, the landwehr, and lungarian insurrection, roust be called out and put into activity. Even if the difficulty of clothing and arming them is got over, it is inpossible to bring them to Znaim and Presburg, from the south eastern provioces, before the 14th August, and the other troops in proportion. Besides the troops raised in Bavaria, 66,000 under the Viceroy have crossed the Tagliamento, and large reserves are collecting at Wurtzburg and Fulda. As these measures menace Vienna, it is necessary to assemble a force at Klageofurth, and near the capital, to counterbalance them. All this must be done without any detachments from the Bohemian army, Carriages cannot he got to supply Russia with the provisions she requires from Bohemia; and as the extension of the French line on the Elbe may render it desirable that part of the allied force should move into that province, it is most desirable that there should be sufficient time for supplying such a force, and that in the mean time the wants of the Aflies should be sufficient time for supplying such a force, and that in the mean time the wants of the Aflies should be supplied from Gallieia."—"Count Metternich's first and principal object in the negotiations at Dresden, in the end of June, was to arge the prolongation of the annistice till the 10th Angust, for the reasons stated in Prince Schwartzenberg's report. He was desirous also that Count Stallian should accompany the Emperor to Trachenberg, who was to be instructed to use his numest to strengthen and decide the Prioce-Royal to coperate with the Aflies. Count Metternich now declared that the Emperor Francis' determination was to support the cause for which the Emperor Alexander hid made such nuble efforts. (- Heads of the Arrangement touching the Armistice and Negotiations. Independent of the Armistice and Negotiations.

(2) Hard, xii, 184. Heads of arrangement touching armistice and negotiations. Lond. 368, Appendix, No. iii. Schooll, x, 257.

he was likely to derive such substantial advantages; yet it was more than doubtful how he would act when the contest was removed to Germany, and when he was brought into conflict with his countrymen, his comrades, and his old commander. In truth, nothing could be more heterogeneous than the composition of his moral qualities, or strange than the political combinations in which he was at this time involved. A Frenchman by birth, he was now engaged in a war of life or death against France, a republican by principle, he was now deeply involved in a coultion of sovereigns against the child of the Revolution; a soldier of fortune under Napoleon, he now headed a powerful army against him; the heir to the throne of Sweden by election, he was now called on to shed the best blood of his people in a contest seemingly foreign to their immediate interests. This character, able indeed and energetic, but vain, declamatory, and overbearing, afforded but little security against his conduct being influenced by some of the contending feelings arising out of so strange a combination, and yet the important position assigned him by the conferences of Trachenberg, and lo which he was well entitled both by his military talents and political station, rendered it of the last importance that the Allies should be able to rely on his steady and sincere co-operation. When the military maps, indeed, were laid ont before him, and the Prince-Royal had his scented white pockethandkerchief in his hand, he descanted with equal animation and eloquence on the great military measures which were in contemplation, but, as was well observed at the time by one who knew him well (1) "lie clothed himself in a pelisse of war, but his under garments were made of Swedish objects and peace." his real was always greatest in Proportion as it appeared to be least necessary. A celebrated French actress, who had lately taken her departure from Stralsund for Vandamme's headquarters, gave rise to various surmises as to the Prince's secret communications with the French I'mperor. the aversion to the Austrian alhance was openly expressed, he publicly aspired to the chief command in the armies of the confederacy; it was only by the most sedulous attention of the crowned heads at Trachenberg that he was 11 41 11 -1, · -1 - 1. - 27 -0 . 40 - 71 -- 1 quarters, that he was retained during the campaign in a course suitable to the great objects of the alliance (2)

Whatever, however, his secret inclinations may have been, Bernardian Whatever, however, his secret inclinations mith respect to the troops which he brought into the field. They amounted to twenty-four thousand lifantry, and four thousand civalry—a very large force for a monarchi which did not, at that period, contain, after the loss of Hulmah, two milions and a hiff of inhalutants; and its composition being drawn almost entirely from the rural population, where the want of labourers was strongly felt, while it rendered the troops more respectible, necessarily imposed upon the communic the dust of economizing, as much as possible, blood so saliable to the rution. Their leaders, Addrectnett, Lowensheim, and others, were not only men of tied ability and valour, but ardenly devoted to the cause of 1 uropean independence, and although the rustic air and uncombed locks of these 'candinavith warriors appeared to some disultantize beside the Bussian and Prassan Guards, yet they were robust, fully clothed, and cliff and they excluded by their conduct in the campaign, that they had not degenerated in the elements of military spirit from their ancestors in the days of Gustavus Adolphus and Charles XII. In addition to this, Bernadotte had under his command twenty-five thousand llanoverian levies, in nart composed of the veterans who had combated in former days under the British standard, and who now, clothed and equipped by British liberality, and headed by the gallant Walmoden, had already attained a surprising degree of efficiency, and burned with anxiety to avenge their country's wrongs in the blood of the enemy. Thirty-five thousand Prussians, in great part landwher, under Bulow and Tanenzein, in the highest state of enthusiastic excitement: twelve thousand Russian veterans, under Woronzoff and Winzingerode; and six thousand German troops, paid by England, but in the Russian service, formed, after all deductions to the rear were taken into account. an army of nearly ninety thousand effective men in the north of Germany, independent of a detached corps of twenty thousand which watched Hamburg; and this force, although heterogeneous, and drawn together from many different nations, was animated in common by the best spirit, and effected most important achievements in the course of the campaign (1).

The most experienced and nowerful of all the divisions of the allied forces, however, was that which was still cantoned in Silesia, and which, being composed of the veterans who had survived the Moscow campaign, and the Prussians who had withstood the shock of France at Lutzen and Bautzen, might he relied upon for any emergencies, how trying soever. During the armistice, this noble force was raised to no less than a hundred and sixty thousand men; having been swelled to that amount, during the hreathing-time afforded by the armistice, by the incredible exertions of the Prussian government, the unhounded spirit of the Prussian neople, and the great reinforcement, sixty thousand strong, which joined the Russian army after the fall of Thorn, and some lesser fortresses on the Vistula. This immense force was at this period cantoned between Schweidnitz and the Oder; but a few days defore the commencement of hostilities, one half of it, including the whole Russian and Prussian gnards, in conformity with the plan laid down in the conferences of Trachenherg, moved into Bohemia and joined the grand Austrian army there, leaving only eighty thousand under the command of the gallant Blueher to maintain the war in Silesia. But this force, which embraced fifty thousand veteran Russians under Langeron, Sacken, and St.-Priest, and thirty thousand Prussians under Kleist, in the very highest state of discipline and equipment, and which possessed, hesides, three hundred and fifty-six pieces of cannon, was animated with an invincible spirit; and its commanders exhibited that rare combination of military audacity with scientific calculation, which constitutes the mainspring of success in war (2).

Character of Blucher. Blucher, the commander-in-chief of this noble army, was a vete-filted. His early history. hairs of age, the whole fire and impetuosity of youth. He was born at Rostock in Mecklenburg, on the 16th December 1742, so that in 1815 he was upwards of seventy years of age. Descended of an old and respectable family of landed proprietors, he first entered the army as cornet in a troop of hussars, in the service of the King of Sweden, in 1757. His education, during the troubles of the Seven Years' War, had been neglected, a want which he never afterwards entirely recovered; but his vigour of character soon made hum distinguished, and threw luminton more honourable career than with the then unwarlike troops of Scandinavia. Made prisoner in 1760 in a skirmish by the Prussian linesars, he immediately entered the service of the Great Frederick, and took an active part in the remaining years of that memorable contest, particularly at the battle of kunnersdorf in 4761. The long period which followed the treaty of peace in 1765, threy the young heutenant into the usual follies and vices of idle military life, and between the sports of the field, the gambling-house, or still worse places of dissipation, he had little leasure to improve himself in the military art. He was engaged in the contest with Poland in 1772, but his impetuous temper having led him into an unjustifiable act towards a Catholic priest, whom he had arrested and threatened with military execution, he was dismissed from the service by Frederick with these characteristic words, "Captain Blucher has got his conge, and may go to the deal!" His career, however, was not destined to be thus terminated. He shortly afterwards married, and was engaged for fourteen verrs in agricultural nursints, by which his fortune was greatly augmented (1) His passion for war, however, was not extinguished by this rural First ex plaits in retirement. In 1786, he again entered the Prussian arms in his old regiment of hussars, four years afterwards he was promoted to the rank of colonel, and, in 1792, distinguished himself by his intrepudity in the invasion of Champagne by the Duke of Brunswick In the campaign of 1791, he was actively encaged in the combat of haiserslantern It was not till 1806. however, that he was called to a theatre worthy of his talents. He was engaged in the disastrons affer the battle of Averstadt, and although the cavalry which he commanded were overthrown in a charge by the terrible artiflery of the

I bleck. Taken prisoner there, he was sent to Hamburg, where he consoled limself, amidst the liminiation of his country, by visions of its future resurrection and glory (2). He afterwards was a member of the Secret Society of the Tigendhund, awaiting in silence the moment of deliverance. Called to the lierd of the army in 4815, he evinced the ardour of the sentiments with which he was inspired by the following proclamation to the Saxons—"I The God of armies has in the east of Europe pronounced i terrible sentence, and the angel of iterith has, by the sword, cold, and famine, cut off '00,000 of the strangers who, in the presumption of their prosperity, sought to subjugate it We go where the finger of Providence directs us, to combat for the security of uncent thrones, for the present independence of nations, and to usher in the Aurora of a brighter day (7).

A true folls by temperament and complexion, with light flowing bars scattered over his hald forchead. The eyes, huge mustaches, and an aquinne countenance, he realized the image of those northern wirriors who combited mader trivening with the legions of flowe, or arrested on the Pitch bloods to interest of the reliensagine's conjugated a historic of clarification and the state of the property of wellnigh perished in the shock. Impetuous and unruly in his desires, he was through life an ardent votary of pleasure; and the attractions of wine, women, and play, chiefly filled up, during intervals of rest, the passions of a mind to which, by nature and habit, violent excitement had become indispensable. But it was the necessity of strong sensation, not selfishness of disposition, which was the eause of these irregularities; and though he indulged them at times to the close of life, and might be seen at Paris, in 4814, rising from eopious libations of champagne to indulge in the excitement of rouge et noir, he was yet ever ready to exchange these unworthy pursuits for the more honourable and yet stronger excitement of the field.

Vehement, irascible, and often improdent, he was yet an ardent patriot : a true German in his heart, his whole soul was wound up in the welfare of the fatherland; alone, of all his contemporaries, he distinctly predicted, amidst the disasters of 1806, the future deliverance of his country (1); deenly implicated in the Tugendbund, he waited only, during the succeeding years of bondage, the moment of retribution; and when Frederick William at length raised the standard of independence, he was the first to draw his sword in its behalf. He could not be said to be a great general, though few commanders have achieved more important or glorious victories; the ardonr of his disnosition, and overflowing impetnosity of his courage, induced him, like Murat, to court danger wherever it was to be found, rather than avert disaster from wherever it threatened. He preferred seeking "the bubble reputation at the cannon's month," to waiting by patience and combination the tardier honours of the general. But he possessed, at the same time, the rapid glance, quick decision, and moral conrage, which constitute such important elements in the character of a commander: like Shwarrow, he always struck home to the centre of the enemy's force, and never wasted his strength on their extremities. He was unrivalled in the tenacity with which he clung to his projects, and the vigour with which he repaired, in an incredihly short'space of time, the most serious disasters; and many of the movements which he executed, particularly the passage of the Elbe, the battle of the Katzbaeh, and the cross march from Ligny to Waterloo, were not only characterized by military genius of the highest order, but produced the most decisive effect upon the issue of the war.

What was wanting in prudence and circumspection for the ordinary duties of a general in the commander-in-chief, was amply compensated by the admirable talents and scientific acquirements of his chief of the staff, General Gneisenau. This most able man, though much younger than Blucher, was endowed with all the foresight, accuracy, and comprehensive views which are, in the long run, indispensable for the successful conduct of a great army. He was born at Schilda, near Torgan, on the 28th October 1760, so that he was twenty years younger than Blucher, and was now Great and was now lifty-three years of age. From his earliest years he evinced the strongest turn for military affairs; but his impetuous turn of mind, as is often the case in Cormany, hard the case in Germany, broke out at the university, and he was obliged to leave the college of Erfurth on a contact the university, and he was obliged to leave the college of Erfurth on account of a duel with a tradesman, and soon after entered the Austrian service and a duel with a tradesman, and soon in entered the Austrian service under Marshal Wurms volved in another duel, and was obliged to leave t :111C ou account of these repeated scrapes, having forb desperate, and engaged in the troops which the M sent out to America. These misfortunes cooled

tion renentant letters from America reconciled him to his father, and in three years this second producal returned to his country and naternal home where he soon entered the Prussian service as a captain of fusiliers In 1795 and 1791 he was engaged with distinction in the Polish war, in 1796 he married, and from that time devoted himself, with the most intense ardour, to the study of the military art. In the war of 1806 he was engaged in the bloods skirmish, at the outset of the campaign, in which Prince I ouisfell, and after the prostration of Prussia, maintained himself with the most heroic resolution in Colberg, till the peace of Tilsit overtook him, still unconquered, within its walls. He then entered the enal service of government, but under pretence of discontent passed over to England, where he was engaged in secret political transactions, in which canacity be made frequent journeys in 1815 to Vienna, St.-Petersburg, and Stockholm No sooner had the disasters of Moscow broken out than he renewed his conferences with the English govern ment, and immediately emberlang for Cormons, repaired to Breslau, where he was appointed quartermaster-general of Blucher's corps lie then laboured assi lugusly with Stein and Scharuhorst at the organization of the Tugenilbund, which spread so far the elements of resistance to France. It was under his direction that the retreat of the Prussians was conducted with so much skill from Lutzen to Breslau, and so lughly were his abilities now appreciated, that on the resumntion of hostilities he was made chief of the staff to Blucker, in room of Scharnhorst, who had died of his wounds received at I utzen, which office he held till the final termination of the war by the britle of Waterloo (1)

Thoroughly acquainted with the seat of war, a perfect master of straters, and invariably accurate in his estimate of distances and the murch of troops, he infused a degree of correctness and precision into the movements of the army of Silesia, which enabled it to inflict the most terrible blows iron the enemy, without sustaining his serious losses itself. I in rope was astomished at the admirable skill with which during that whole campaign, the movements of this important army were conducted. Violding ground, where Aanolcon pressed on them in person with superior forces, returning again to the offensive the moment that the eagles of the Imperial Guard were seen receding in the distance, Sacribeing on every occasion the Instre of senarate achievements to the promotion of general objects, and sedulously following out, amidst the intriencies of their own movements, the leading plan of operations agreed on la the allied sovereigns. Without detracting from the great services of Marshal Blucher in that eventful contest, it may safely be affirmed, that the chief ment of it, at least so far as the general conduct of the campaign is concerned, as well as of the contest in I rance in 1814, and in the guidance of the Prussian force in 1815, is the to Central Gnersenan, and what is very remark alle, in could aling the modern Hannibal, the Marcellus of the Alues was found under the grey looks of the Prossian veteran, and the halfins in the more vonthful I reast of his crited hen-

tenant

Ao jealousy whitever marred the cordial co oj cration of these states of the control of the states of the control of the states of the comparatively which the veteran field ander the guidance of his comparatively states of the control of

What would you think if we were to move in such and such a way?' and in less than an hour the orders were given." The destruction of the French army on the Katzbach; the passage of the Elbe, and the battle of Mockern, near Leipsic, were in great measure owing to his judicious counsels. He had a great part, also, in the bold advance towards Paris in 1814, which brought about the fall of Napoleon; and never was more rejoiced than when his unlooked-for return stilled the discord among the Allies at the Congress of Vienna, and gave him another opportunity of striking a blow at the power of France. He directed the retreat at Ligny, after Blucher was disabled by the fall of his horse, and had the principal share in the decisive cross march on the 18th to Waterloo, which, with the valour of the English army, terminated the contest (1).

The grand Austrian army, under the command of Prince Schwartzenberg, cantoned in the neighbourhood of Prague, consisted of a hundred and twenty thousand men, great part of whom were in an incomparable state of discipline and efficiency. It was divided into four corps, commanded by Count Colloredo, General Chastellar, and afterwards General Meerfeldt, General Giulay, and Count Klenau: while Prince Hesse Homberg was at the head of the reserve, and General Bubna of the detached corps. Parts of this force, however-in particular, the infantry of Klenau's corns-were newly raised, and hardly as yet capable of withstanding the shock of Napoleon's legions; and, though the artillerymen were scientific and expert, the horses for the guns and waggon train were greatly inferior to those of the Russians, and little adequate to the fatigues of a protracted and active eampaign. Very different, however, was the aspect of the eavalry. In this force were included twenty thousand admirable horse: the euirassiers and hussars of the guard, in particular, outshone any in Europe in the splendour of their appearance, the quality of their horses, and the brillianey of their appointments; and their achievements on the field of Leipsic were worthy of their high renown and martial aspect. When the elite of this immense force was reviewed in the neighbourhood of Prague by the Emperor of Russia and King of Prussia in the middle of August, immediately after the resumption of hostilities, to the number of seventy-seven thousand infantry, and eight thousand horse, with three hundred and eighty pieces of cannon, it presented an array rarely paralleled in Europe, and formed a military spectacle of unrivalled sublimity. The cuirassiers on this interesting occasion were presented with new standards; and when the three sovereigns nailed, in unison, their colours to the poles in token of their firm alliance, it seemed as if no power on earth could resist a league of potentates, one only of whom could summon up so noble an array (2).

Prince Prince Schwartzenberg, who commanded the Austrian force, and Schwartzen afterwards obtained the general direction of the allied armies, tharacter, though far from being a general of the highest order, was nevertheless in many respects well qualified for the arduous duties with which he was entrusted. It was no easy matter, as he himself said, to command an army when kings and emperors were at headquarters; and probably there was no man in all the imperial service who could have discharged that arduous and delicate duty so well as himself. Without possessing any great force of mind, or decision of character, he was yet admirably calculated, by the suavity of his manners, the prudence of his disposition, and the amenity of his temper, to allay the realousies, and keep together the often discordant noners of the alliance

youth to the very high tiet and a commander

the Allies his possessed at the same time the prudent temper and conciliatory disposition which, in dealing with such exalted personages was fitted to prevent any serious dissensions arising among them, and yet preserve, upon the whole the even tenor of his own intentions. His combinations were misdicious, often able and comprehensive, but he wanted the decision remissite for carrying them into execution, and more than once, particularly at Dresden in 4815, and in Champagne in 4814, when he had brought Napolcon, by his well conceived measures, to the very brink of destruction, he failed in effecting his object by want of vigour at the decisive moment in carrying them into execution. For the hold measures which in the end hurled the Freach emperor from the throne, we are indebted to the indomitable moral courage of Lord Castlereagh, and the noble decision of the Emperor Alexander Schwartzeoberg's measures were of a more temporizing and prudent character, and he more than once seriously endangered the allied cause by his ready recurrence to the favourite Austriao sten of a retreat Let justice must observe, that the powers even of the generalissimo of the allied armies were far from heing of an unlimited character, the Aulie Council, now transported to the very theatre of action, exercised a secret and sometimes prettidicial control over its operations, diplomacy often interposed its obstructions, and reserted its supremacy in the most critical moments, and even when he was most unfettered, the power of individual direction was generally as much restricted as the responsibility of the generalissimo was increased, by the nature of a contest which had never less than two, sometimes three, of the greatest crowned heads in Furone, at the military headquarters (1) The grand army of Bohemia, after eighty thousand of the Russians and Prussians had joined it, formed a mass of above two hundred and twenty thousand combatants, of whom forty thousand were admirable horse, with seven hundred pieces of cannon, which, from the salient hastion of Bolicinia, threatened the rear and communications of the French emperor on the Libe. This, with eighty thousand pressing on him from Silesia, and ninety thousand from the north, composed a force of nearly four hundred thousand men, ready for instant operation in the field, all acting under one direction, in a conceotric circle, upon one central point. The forces, therefore, at the outset of the campaign, were very nearly balanced, and Nano'con's central position astride on the Elbe, and with six fortresses on that river in his hands, might seem more than sufficient to counterbalance all the enthusiasm which unimated the enemy's troops. But this was by no means the whole of the military array which the ollied sovereigns had at their disposal, and it was evident that, if the contest were protracted for any time, the forces of the coalition would acquire a decisive preponderance against him. The military force of France was exhausted, not two thousand troops remained even in the barracks of Parls, a force scarcely count to the daily service of the metropolis, and the depots in the interior had sent off their list man (2) On the other hand, vast reinforcements might erclong be expected within the allied lines. Lenningson was organizing a large army of seventy thousand Russians in the interior of Poland, which, it was calculated,

^{(1 &}quot;Tar sand the meighbour of departments had terropers on 1113 7 131 and 1 and 1 als

⁽¹⁾ Fain il 213 S.e.P. Wilcon, Power of Rus- mot at that por al more than 2000 troops, reterent a 20 Lond 97 and grandarine aclanted." and force I die Letter nor would join the allied forces on the Elbe in the first week of September; the last reserve, it is true, of the Museovite empire, but to which Napoléon had nothing additional on his side to oppose: twenty thousand men watched the combined force of Danes and French conscripts which Davoust commanded at Hamburg; and the total amount of Russian and Prussian forces, which blockaded the fortresses that still held out for Napoléon on the Oder and the Vistula, amounted to the enormous number of one hundred thousand men. Thus the total allied force accumulated in Poland and the north of Germany, was nearly six hundred thousand men (1); and although only two-thirds of this immense force, or four hundred thousand combatants, could be relied on for the shock of war on the Elbe, yet the remainder would in the end prove available, when the eighty thousand French veterans, who were now shut up in the fortresses on the Oder and Vistula, had yielded to the pangs of hunger, or the ravages of disease.

Immense as the forces were which were thus arrayed against each both sides other on the banks of the Elbe, they did not compose the whole of on the Bathose which were drawn forth by the contending parties in this varian and Italian gigantic conflict. Five-and-twenty thousand Austrians, in addifrontiers. tion, were assembled, under the Prince de Reuss, at Lintz on the Danube, to observe the motions of Wrede, who was at the head of twenty-six thousand Bayarians in the neighbourhood of Munich; while Hiller, with fifty thousand excellent troops, and one hundred and ninety-eight guns, was prepared to eross the Isonzo, and renew the conflict on the Italian plains with the Viceroy, who had arrayed sixty thousand combatants on the banks of the Tagliamento and the Adige. In addition to this, an army of reserve was forming between Vienna and Presburg, under the Grand Duke Ferdinand of Wirtemberg, which was to be raised to sixty thousand men from the distant resources of Hungary and Transylvania, which had not yet arrived at the theatre of war; making a total of seven hundred and thirty thousand combatants who obeyed the orders of the conference of Trachenberg. If to this he added a hundred and twenty thousand men who, at this period, were preparing, under the standards of Wellington, to cross the Pyrences, where Soult, with eighty thousand, was intrenched to resist them, and forty-five thousand allied troops in Catalonia, who pressed on an equal force under Marshal Suchetthe general result will be that NINC HUNDRED THOUSAND men in arms encircled the French empire, which was still defended by seven hundred thousand who followed the fortunes of the Revolution (2). But if the central situation of

- (1) Plotho. ii. App. iii. Schoell, x. 268, 271. Hard. xii. 220.
- (2) Total French Army in Germany at the resumption of Hostilities on 15th .

 August 1813.

Imperial Guard, Infantry .- Marshal the Duke of Taxviso.

Divisions .- Old Guard. Bats. Squads. Infan. Cav. Friant, grenadicrs, . . 6.000 Curial, chasseurs, . Young Guard. Dumoutier, . . 8) Barrois, . . Boyeldieu, . 22,400 Roguet, . . Cavalry .- General Nansouts. Guyot, grenadiers, . . . Ornano, dragoons, 6 Lefebyre-Desnouettes, chasseurs, 5.000 6 Krazinski, lancers, 6 Guards of Honour, 10

Carry forward, . . 40 34 28,400 5,000

	Bats Squads, Infan	Czv
Brongl t for and	10 31 28 400	5 000
1 i lory - G neral lassaure at Z tan
1 lumon ea 12 ll l _{[1} 0	8 13 000
23 Dufour	5)
B ade Co b eau	8	1 000
2d Cop -V croz at Z Ham
4 Te e 5 Corb nesu	ŝ)
6 Mon on Duverney 6 B	8 22 100
Market 1	» )
8 Sonha ti	15\
9 D linas	13 1 22 200
10 libe t	13 33 800
Br sade Four noon	10	1 300
4 h Corp -General Bearense at pro tau
12 No au l	20 000
15 Fon anell Ital 2 5 18 Franquemont Wart unbergers	8 20 000
3 A Corp -C ne al laux s or at Goldlerg
16 Na nn	12)
17 In Ind 10 Rosh mbezu	10 23 800
5 / Cop -Magnost at Buartlau	•
no Compans	10)
ny Compans 21 No net 22 tred chs	18 *00
1 h lory -Crueral Rear sa at Co rl a	• ,
32 Lane e	(0)
31 Yerog (Saxons) 38 Sahrer (Ib.)	21000
39 Marcha ((Hessia a)	10)
Sheap (Pol). For arouse at Z to 25 D× len+ y 27 Ross elyky	8 12 000
A br pade	۰, ۵	800
11 & Corp -M coors wat Lornenberg
31 Grand 33 Feer pet	10)
36 Charper e	8 18 200
		1 003
174 Corp. —Oregon at D 1 mr 13 (ru re
H Ca rus not Buglow I (Pa san	11 21 000
Ragion I (Pa san Abrgad	6)	800
til Corp - Fr F a sit sa	•	900
41 Claps 1	9)
16 45 Pz unt	3 13,00
	 '
Total	361 72 318 300	2 560
Perent of Cord 7 - Talk 14 or Y c 4
Sto. Castes	301	1 000
(in presents Donner or	. 41)
	- 41/

Cary frest

37 113 211 103 71,503

in the field, type from the effects of the indounded culturism and exagetion in which his own apprecian leid excited among his enemies 19.

The whole of the allied armies in Germany were animated by the highest

The State of Control o

St. gomenium of legite.

11. 1

spirit, and inspired with the most touching cordinlity. The feeling of depression by which the Russians were animated when, in the outset of the campaign, they found themselves far advanced in Europe, and engaged in

French	Blockeded	Paren

		Men
The Garr son of Danta g		20 000
Garr son of Zamose		4 000
Garr son of Modl n.		3 000
Gar son of Stett m		10 000
Garrison of Austr a		5 000
Garr son of Glogan		6,000
t arr son of Torgan		8 600
Garmon of W tenberg		5 000
Garr son of Magdeburg		10 000
Garr son of Wortzburg		Į 500
Garrison of B eiden		5 000
Garr son of Fre berg		800
Garrison of Erforth		2 000
	Total	204 204

-Provise vol 11 App 90

Summary of French Forces to Germany and Italy

	Total	467 074	50 900
Bayar an Army of Olsservat on		22 200	1 800
lianca		15 000	900
Blocksded Garrisons		80 300
Pr nee bu, ne sormy in Italy		50 574	1 800
Detached		39 000	4 200
In the field		250 000	42 200
		lafantry	Car Iry

Grand Total 517,974

617 183

Allied Forces in Germany and I aly at Berump on of Hart hit et on 15th Sugart 1818 Active Forces

	Bles.	Canaon
The Crend Army of Robert a under Pr nee Schwartzeaber,	237 170	693
The Army of 5 les 2 under Elucher	93 372	338
The Army of the North under the Crown Pr por	151 012	331
The Pe 'an Reserve ander & an agree	57 329	198
The Corps d Armee of the Pr nee of Reus,	21 750	41
The Austr an Army of Reserve	$0 000	170

Total in the F eld,

BLOCKED OF FORCES

Refore Danta g .	35 660
Pefore Zamose	13 700
Before Glouin	23 430
Before Cu .	8 450
Defore Stett a.	23 500

Total Biochading Force 101 Total in the F M 614

Total Floritad og Forre	107

-t area, rol li App 11

The Grand Army of Enbros a under Pr use Schwartsenberg	120,00
Array worker the Prince of Rous on the Inn	21 72
Army of Italy under I leld Warshal II Lay	50,60
Army of Reserve under the Archdule tord and and the Prince of	r
Westenberg	60 01

⁻Prates vol. it Are. 2

Cordial spiral a fresh war, which seemed foreign to the real interests of their rit of male numbers with country, had given place to an universal and enthusiastic desire to which the Allied share with their Prussian brethren in the deliverance of the father-Powers were animated. Injuries a joint desire of vengeance; valour on both sides, mutual respect. Those who had stood side by side on the fields of Lutzen and Bautzen, felt confident against the world in arms. The universal animation with which the war was embraced by all classes in Germany, had excited a corresponding enthusiasm in the Russian warriors; the generous flame had

II. Rossians.

II. Rossians.
Russian Troops in the	Grand A	rmy of Bo	hemia.
•	Battal.	Squad. B		Cossick Regts.	Men.
1. Corps of Wittgenstein,	39	36	7	4	22,400
stantine,	46	72	211	20	36,020
Total, .	. 85	108	281	24	58,420
Russian Troops	in the Sile:	sian Arm	r.
1. Corps of Langeron,	. 46	49	11	7	27,600:
2. Corps of Sacken,	. 24	20	5	8	15,000
3. Corps of Saint-Priest,	. 21	4	3 .		9,400
Total, .	. 91	73	19	15	52,000
Russian Troops in	the Army	of the No	rth.
1. Corps of Winzingerode,	· 11	8	3	8	8,826
2. Corps of Worowzof,	. 7	15	4	8 18	8,667
3. Corps of Walmoden,	. 11	12	1	10	8,056
Total, .	. 29	35	8	34	25,549
The Russian Army of Reserve under		co	4 E	8	F= 200
Benningsen,	. 75	68	15	-	57,329
,	, 270	284	992	18	193,298
Infantry,					121,092
Cavalry,					31,272
Cossacks,	: =		-	_	14,691 26,243
Total Mer	n				193,298
	111011, .				834
Army of Reserv	c under B	cnningsen	١.
• •		Bats.	Squad.	Guns.
1 Corps of Markow,		14	70	58	16,467
2 Corps of Doctoroff,	• • •	· 29	25	120	26.571
o corps of count osterman rowin,	• • • •		27	40	17,045
	otal,	. 73	122	198	60,083
	in the Fi	eld.
Infantry, Cavalry and Cossacks	,	: : :	40,119 12,886
Artillery and Pioncer	٠, ٠,	• • •	3,944
	al, Men, Cannor		57,477 198
Рьотно, vol. ii. App. 8.
Aimy of the Prin	ce of Reus	on the In	m.
- 4			Men.
Infantry,	• • •		16,450
Cavalry,	• • •	• • •	7,250 1,050
	- • •		1,000
	Tota		24,750
Corps in Ite	aly under l
Рьотно, vol. ii. App. 70.		•	50,000

spread to every breast, and such was the warhke spirit with which they were animated, that it was with no small difficulty, and only by the personal exertion of the allied sovereigns, that they could be prevented from breaking into open hostilities on the expiration of the orizinal period assigned for the armstice. The Emperor Alexander and King of Prussia set the example of this touching fraternity constantly hing together on terms of the closest intimacy, they had not alhought nor a wish but in common, their suites formed one large family, and when they reviewed their respective troops, they always appeared in the uniform of each other's guards, and with the military orders hanging on their breasts, which were shared by them with the humblest of their soldiers (I).

Nice preparations on so vast and unprecedented a scale had been made on both sides for the resumption of hostilities, it bestrates been made on both sides for the resumption of hostilities, it bestropes comes almost Inderous to follow out the diplomatic evasions, trifling disputes, and studied procrastination, of the congress of Prague 1945 of Official intimation was sent to the French emperor on the 41th July, by Metternich, that the alhed sovereigns had agreed to the profongation of the armistice, and had sent their plenipotentiaries to that city, viz 11 d'Anstett on the part of Russia, and 11 de Humboldt on that of Prussia, while Metternich Humself represented Austria and these high functionaires all arrived there on the 45th Instead, however, of straights ay complying with this intimation, and sending his own plenipotentiaries to commence business, Aapoleon, when every hour was precious, commenced an altereation with the Prussian and Russian governments upon the choice they had

tions came with a peculiarly bad grace from the plempotentiaries of thore  in volutionary dynasty; and certainly llumbold, the illustrous naturatists was on a level with I Maret or Caulaineourt, neutier of whom hadany pretensions to fimily, and they were accordingly, after much angry correspondence, finally overruled, and the negotiations carried on with the existing diplomatists (2)

No sooner, however, was this difficulty surmounted, and Narwhich arest honne and Cantineourt both arrived at Prague, where they were report of not installed till the 28th, sixteen days after the arrival of the allied diplomatists, than a new and still more serious cause of dissension are e recording the form in which the negotiations should be conducted Metternich contended, that they should proceed after the manner of the congress of Teschen in 1779, that Is, that the negotiations should be conducted by means of written notes, addressed, not by the belligerent parties to each other, but by both to the mediating power, and hy it transmitted to the plenipotentiary of the power for whom they were respectively intended To this proposition the allied diplomatists at once gave their consent, I it the French strennously contended for the course pursued at the concress of I trecht, where both parties sent their notes directly to each other, and the communications were curried on, partly in writing, and partly verbally it is evident that the former method was calculated to increase the importance and influence of the mediating power, by enabling it to keep in its hands the thread of the whole negotiations, and it is equally plain, that when parties are really in earnest, and time, as in this instance, presses, it is far more expedient to proceed at once to personal intercourse and verbal conferences, than to adopt the circuitous form of written communications addressed to a third party. Austria, therefore, by contending for the latter course, clearly evineed her desire to procrastinate; but it is equally plain, that if France had been sincere in the desire of an accommodation, she would have preferred the commencement of negotiations in any conceivable method, to the prolongation of unmeaning discussions about its form. In this dispute about the mode of conducting the conferences, the whole short remainder of the period assigned for the prolongation of the armistice was consumed; and the 40th August, the fatal period fixed for its termination, passed without either any commencement having been effected of a negotiation, or any proposal made for its longer continuance (1).

⁽¹⁾ Land 75 76. Opel x 117 160 157 157 Am ers to Mettern ch August 7 1818 Capel.

It is incorrect, however, to say that neither party in this armistice ferent pow- wished for a termination of hostilities. Both parties, in reality, desired it: but both were alike aware, that the terms on which they were willing to come to an accommodation, where such as there was no prospect of attaining. Austria was not only willing, but anxious to mediate with efficacy, and bring about a general accommodation; but then it was on condition that she obtained the Illyrian provinces, and a share of Italy for herself, and the renunciation by France of the confederation of the Rhine and the kingdom of Italy, for the cause of European independence. Russia and Prussia were ready to terminate hostilities; but it was on condition that Prussia was restored and augmented, Poland dissolved, and the Hanse towns restored to freedom. France was prepared to renounce some of her acquisitions, and sheathe for a time at least the sword of conquest; but she could contemplate no greater abasement than the restitution of the Illyrian provinces to Austria, of her lost provinces to Prussia, and the dissolution of the grand duehy of Warsaw, to soothe Russia; and still clung to the Rhenish confederacy, the Swiss supremacy, the kingdom of Italy, the Peninsular and the Westphalian thrones, and the extension of the French frontier over Holland and the Hanse towns. Thus, though all parties were willing to negotiate, none were sufficiently lowered in their pretensions to render an understanding practicable; the victories of twenty years could not be obliterated by a single disaster, how great soever; and, as in the conferences between the Gauls and Romans of old, the sword required to be thrown in to restore the balance (2).

Napoléon himself gave the clearest sense of the hopelessness of Napoléon's Journey to all attempts at a pacification, by a step which at once dissolved all the hopes which had been entertained at Dresden of a speedy termination of hostilities. On the 26th July, three days before the French plenipotentiaries, Caulaincourt and Narbonne, had come to Prague, though a fortnight after those of the Allies had been in that city, and seven weeks after the commencement of the armistice, Napoléon set out from Dresden for Mayence, to inspect the fortifications in progress at that place, and to meet the Empress Marie-Louise, who, by his directions, had come to meet him in that frontier city. He remained with her for six days, during which the most active military preparations were going forward, and every thing announced the speedy resumption of hostilities. What the communications were which passed between him and the Empress Regent during this momentous period is now known by the best possible evidence, that of the Empress herself, "Associated," said she to the senate, "in that short interview, with the most secret thoughts of the Emperor. I then perceived with what sentiments he would be inspired if seated on a dishaustred throne and under a crown without clory." In these words were truly revealed the most secret feelings of Nanoleon. Scated on a revolutionary throne, and the head of a military republic, he was compelled to advance without intermission: unbroken success was to him not merely essential to nonularity, but the price of existence. He was much pressed at Mayence by the Empress and senate to make peace on any terms; but his answer, in three words, conveyed the whole secret of his policy during the remainder of his reign, " Tout ou rien." The Emperor spent six days at that place, inspecting the fortifications and reviewing the troops, which were incessantly urged on to swell the roll of Augereau's corns, and on the 3d August returned to Dresden, where the increased vigour of his military preparations at all points, and the produgious concourse of troops who incessantly poured into that capital. soon dispelled the hones which had till then been entertained of a general peace (1).

⁽¹⁾ Sec Official Corresp. in Fain, ii. 200; and (2) Capef. x. 153. 154. Fain, ii. 92, 93. Capef. x. 155, 156.

Citimatom The day after Napolion returned from Mayence he wrote a confidential letter to the Emperor of Austria, a copy of which was communicated to Metlernich, desiring to know, in a categorical manner, how the cabinet of Vienna proposed that peace should be arranged, and whether, in the event of hostilities, she would make common cause with France. This led to more substantial overtures; and on the 7th August Metternich transmitted the ultimatum of his cabinet, which was as follows :-"The dissolution of the grand duchy of Warsaw, which was to be divided between Russia. Austria, and Prussia, reserving Dantzle for the latter power; the re-establishment of flamburg and the flanse Towns in their independence; the reconstruction of Prussia in its ancient possessions, with a frontier on the Elbes the cession to Austria of all the Illerian provinces, including Trieste," These were the cardinal points; but the Austrian diplomatist stated as minor questions, which would require to be admisted in a general pacification, the independence of Holland, of Spain, and of the Pontifical States (2).

to cede the lilyrian provinces to Austria, with Flume, but refused to give up Trieste; the confederation of the Bline was to be extended to the Oder, and the Integrity of the Danish domintons guaranteed. These terms were dispatched in duplicate to Prague, where they arrived early on the morning of the 11th; but after twelve o'clock on the preceding alght, which was the termination of the armistice. They were not such, however, as Austria could agree to; and the armistice having now expired without any aeronomodation having been come to, the Bussian and Prussian plenipotentialres, at makes a might on the 10th, addressed official infimations to Mettermeh, that their powers were at an end, and the congress dissolved on the 11th was to make the congress dissolved to the 11th the set of the congress dissolved to the 11th the court and Narbonne, and on the day following Austria declared was acainst France.

The grounds stated in this official instrument, on the part of the Austrian with France, were as follow:—"The progress of events at the congress, left no room for doubt that the French government was insincere in its professions of a desire for peace. The delay in the arrival of the French plenipotentiaries, under pretexts which the great objects to be discussed at the congress might well have reduced to silence; the insufficiency of their instructions on points of form, which occasioned the loss of much precious time, when a few days only remained for the most important of all negotiations: all these circumstances combined, demonstrated too clearly that peace, such as Austria and the allied sovereigns desired, was foreign to the views of France; that she accepted the form of a congress, in order to avoid the reproach of heing the cause of the prolongation of war, but with a secret desire to elude its effeets, or in the wish to separate Austria from the other powers already united with her in principles, before treaties had consecrated their union for the cause of peace and the happiness of the world. Anstria comes out of this negotiation, the result of which has deceived her most cherished hopes, with the consciousness of the good faith which has animated her throughout. More zealous than ever for the noble end which she has proposed, she does not take up arms but to attain it, in concert with the powers which are animated by the same sentiments. Ever disposed to aid in the establishment of an order of things, which, by a wise division of power, may place the preservation of peace under the shield of an association of independent states, she will neglect no occasion for arriving at such a result (1); and the knowledge she has acquired of the courts now become her allies, gives her a certain assnrance that they will sincerely co-operate in so salutary a purpose."

To this it was replied on the part of the French emperor: -"Eyer since the month of Fehruary, the hostile dispositions of the cabinet of Vienna have been known to all Europe. Denmark, Saxony, Bayaria, Wirtemberg, have documents in their archives which prove that Austria, under pretence of the interest which she tack in her ally, and of the love of neace, nonrished a secret jealousy of France. The undersigned will not go over the system of protestations, so prodigally made on the one hand, and of insinuations, covertly spread on the other, which the cabinet of Vienna has adopted, and which, when fully developed, has prostituted what has hitherto heen reckoned most sacred among men-a mediation, a congress, and the words of peace. If Austria desire hostility, what need had she of a false language, or of enveloping France with a tissue of deceitful snares which met her on every side? If the mediator really wished for peace, would be have pretended that transactions so complicated could be adjusted in the space of fifteen or twenty days? Is it an indication of a pacific disposition to propose to dictate peace to France in less time than it would require to conclude the capitulation of a besieged town? The peace of Teschen was only concluded after four months of negotiation. Six weeks were consumed at Sistow before the conferences on the forms were concluded; the negotiation for the peace of Vienna lasted two months, though the greater part of the Austrian states were in the hands of France. Can it be seriously proposed to reconcile the differences, and adjust the interests, of France, Austria, Russia, Prussia, Denmark, Saxony, and so many other states, watch in hand, in lifteen days? But for the fatal intervention of Austria, peace at this moment would have been concluded between Russia, France, and Prussia. Austria, the enemy of France, and covering her ambition under the mask of a mediator, complicated every thing, and rendered reconciliation impossible. But Austria, in an open and a owed state of liosibity, is in a position at once more sincere and more simple, l'irrope is nearer peace, there is a complication the less. If Austria is really desirous of an accommodation, let her name a place which may be neutralized, and set apart for a congress, where plenipotentiaries of all the powers, great and small, may assemble, and the negotiations may proceed with the gravity and deliheration suited to the magnitude of the interests at issue, without the Asian continuance of hostilities. To this last proposal letternich replied, that the proposal for a congress should forthwith be communicated by the three allied powers to their other allies, but before their answers could be received the struggle recommenced, and all thoughts of peace were drowned in the roar and whird of war (1).

⁽¹⁾ Fain, ii, 212, 216. Declaration of Austria,

It may eafely be affirmed that France had the better in this demental described by the angle of the control o drawn by centz, when was shortly alterwards published by the calmider of the had been struck between wind and water by this manifesto, by omitting in his publication of it in the Moniteur the most material passages which it contained (2) And so reasonable were the terms of Austra's illumatum, already given, that we have Lord Londonderry's authority for the fact, that in a private conversation between Caulaincontra and Delterment, the former admitted, that the were Aspolion he would at once accept them, but that he had no power to do so, and that they must be referred to the Emperor (3)

Priver Metreasien, who bore so distinguished a part in this memorable negotiation, and in whose hands the question of peace or a new war was in a manner definitively placed, was a state-man, who for allove a quarter of a century exercised so great an influence on the history of Furope, that any history might justly be regarded as defective that did not delineate the leading features of his character and blography. He was the son of a public functionary, who, at an early period of the revolutionary war, bore a distinguished part in the administration of the Heinleh proxinces, and was born in 1775, at his father's hereditary seat near Johannisberg, on the banks of the Piline I ducated at Strasburg, he early improved his information regarding public affairs, by travels in Germany, Holland, and Creat Brithin, and soon after entered the diplomatic line, and served at the congress of flastadt, in 1739 His great al ilules, however, soon attracted notice at a court, which, justly impressed with the vast importance of diplomatic talent, never fails, ilespite its aristocratic prepossessions, to seek for it wherever it is to be found, even in the humblest ranks of the state, and he was employed on missions of importance to St.-Petersburg in 1804, and Berlin in 1803. At both these capitals he sedulously studied, not only the national resources, but the temperament and habits of the people; and as his elegant and polished manners gave him an easy access to the highest circles, he soon became personally acquainted with the most influential persons at the northern cabinets. After the peace of Presburg, in 1805, he was appointed ambassador at Paris; and in that delicate situation, though representing a vanquished monarch, he succeeded, at the early age of thirty-three, in conciliating all who came in contact with him, by the urbanity of his manners, and the admirable skill with which he maintained a difficult and yet important position. In 1809, he was appointed chancellor of state upon the resignation of Count Stadion, under whose auspices he had risen to eminence, and whose known hostility to France rendered it necessary for him to retire upon the peace of Schoenbrunn; and for more than thirty years from that period he exercised, almost without control, the highest authority in the Austrian dominions (1).

⁽¹⁾ Miret adestration Aug 11 1511 and 2 enter handle Mark and 11 1512 and 2 enter handle Aug 21 1512 (2) Lead in Senter voys 21 1512 (2) Lead (2) L

His chaine-No diplomatist, even in that age of intellectual giants, excelled, perhaps hardly any equalled Metternich, in the calm and sagacious survey which he took of existing events, in the prophetic skill with which he divined their probable tendency, and the admirable tact with which, without exciting unnecessary jealousy, he contrived to render them conducive to the interests of the country with whose direction he was entrusted. An easy and graceful address, a coolness which nothing could disturb, an inexhaustible flow of brilliant conversation, a fascinating power of delicate flattery, while they rendered him the charm of the highest society wherever he went, concealed powers of the first order, and a sagacity in discerning the probable tendency of events which never was surpassed. He had not the moral courage which rendered Lord Castlereagh superior to the storms of fortune, nor the heroic sense of duty which made Wellington indifferent to them, nor the ardent genius which enabled Napoléon to direct their fury; his talent, and there it was unrivalled, consisted in gaining possession of the current, and directing it to his purposes. Laissez venir was his ruling principle at all periods of his life; but this seeming insouciance was not the result of listlessness or indifference, but of a close observation of the course of events, a strong sense of the danger of directly opposing it, and a conscious power of ultimately obtaining its direction. He was well aware of the tide in the affairs of men which every age has so clearly evinced, and trusted, in combating the revolutionary torrent, chiefly to its speedy tendency, like all violent passions, to wear itself out. No man was more fixed in his opinions, or more convinced of the necessity of upholding those conservative principles, both in internal government and external relations, which the French Revolution had wellnigh subverted; but none, at the same time, saw more clearly the necessity of awaiting the proper time for action, or disguising formed determinations till the proper season for executing them had arrived. A perfect master of dissimulation, he was able to act for years in opposition to his real tenets, without letting his secret designs be perceived, or even suspected; and such was the power which he possessed of disguising his intentions, that down to the very last moment, in the congress of Prague, he succeeded in concealing them even from the penetrating eye of Napoléon.

Talents of this description might have been in the last degree dangerous in the hands of an ambitious and unprincipled man; but in Metternich's case they were restrained by influences of a higher description, which in Ilia pravate nonour and a great measure secured their right direction. Though abundantly 3-21110 unsernoulous in diplomatic exasion in state affairs, and generally acting on the principle, that in public perofications, as in love, oaths and protestations are the weapons which both parties may make use of at pleasure. he was yet of un-ullied honour in private life, and whatever he said on the honour of a centleman, might with confidence be relied on. Though long vested with almost unlimited power, and often placed in hostility with the aspuring spirit especially of Itahan liberalism, he had nothing eruel or vindictive in his disposition; blood was hardly ever shed under his administration, and secondary nunishment, though sometimes severe, inflicted only so far as was deemed necessary to preserve the consistency of a despotic frame of government Above all, his spirit was essentially natriotic his ruses and subterfuges, and they were many, were all directed to the extrication of his country be ascribed to the reaction in Europe against French oppression, which was commencing when he was called to the helm of affairs, and soon produced a general effert-secence which was irressible, still minch also must be confessed to be owing to the skilfulness of the pilot who weathered the storm—who yielded to it when its force was irressible, and gained the mastery of its direction when the gales were setting in his own favour.

⁽t) Hard. xii. 60, 61. Biog. Univ. art. Melternich, Sup.

"Every thing for the people, pothing by them," which Napoleon described as the true secret of government (1), was the means by which his conduct was uniformly regulated in domestic adminis-He had the strougest aversion to those changes which are forced on government by the people, but clearly saw the propriety of disarring their leaders of the most dangerous weapons which they wielded, by a paternal system of domestic administration, and a sedulous attention to their material interests. He recognish prohibited the importation of hierary works having a democratic or infidel tendency, and exercised in this respect a vexations and perhaps unnecessary strictness over travellers, the press at Vienna was subjected to the usual consors hip of absolute governments, and public thought confined within those channels which the Romish Church and Autic Council deemed advisable. But within these limits no minister ever attended with more anxiety and success to the interests of the people; public instruction has been rendered universal; the hereditary states exhibit in their uniform wellbeing the Hessed effects of a outernal administration; the provinces of Lombardy have almost forgot, in the substantial blessings of German government, the visionary dreams of trahan independence; and the Austrian monarchy as a whole, exhibits, with a few exceptions, an example of general felicity, which may well put more popular governments to the binth for the time when we was raised to the supreme direction of all uses in [50%, full the superior of the congress of Praga e [6, 1817], were well described by himself to with barles Stewart. The four little finances of the monarchy insolvent, its military strength we do end, its public spirit crushed by not faithful lits first care was to arrange and bring about the marriage of the arridded estimated of the superior of the arridded estimated.

Marie Louise, in order to raise his country one step from the abyss into which it had fallen: never intending, however, when the national existence and power were again seemed, to make any permanent change on the policy of the state. This policy, for the three years which followed the peace of Schoenbrunn, was attended with the happiest effects; insomuch that, when Austria was again called to appear on the theatre of Europe, she found herself speedily at the head of a force which recalled the most prosperous days of the monarchy. His object throughout was to re-establish the influence and power of his country, and through it give peace to the world : and on this principle he resolutely resisted all the entreaties with which he was beset, to join Austria to the alliance after the disasters of the Russian campaign, till the neriod had arrived when his preparations were complete, and matters had arrived at such a crisis, that she could interpose with decisive effect. But that his policy was essentially pacific, and that he had no desire to augment Austria when restored to her suitable place in Europe at the expense of less powerful states, is decisively proved by the fact, that ever since the peace of Vienna in 1814, and fall of Napoléon, she has remained at rest, and no projects of ambition have either agitated her councils, or disturbed the peace of Europe (1).

Unbounded was the joy diffused through the Russian and Prussian Universal joy in the allied grow troops by the accession of Austria to the alliance. To outstrip the at the june, slow arrival hy couriers of the long wished-for intelligence, bonfires were prepared on the summits of the Bohemian mountains; and at midnight on the 10th, their resplendent light told the breathless host in Silesia that two hundred thousand gallant allies were about to join their standard. The Emperor of Russia and King of Prussia, with their respective troops, were assembled in anxious expectation at Trachenherg, in a large barn, awaiting the agreed on signal, when, a little after midnight on the night of the 10th, loud shouts on the outside announced that the flaines were seen; and soon the sovereigns themselves, hastening to the door, beheld the blazing lights, prophetic of the fall of Napoléon, on the summits of the mountains. Such was the joy which pervaded the deeply agitated assembly, that they all embraced, many with tears of rapture. Spontaneous salvos of artillery, and feax-de-joie of musketry, resounded through the whole Russian and Prussian lines. Joy beamed in every countenance: confidence had possessed itself of every heart. With lightsome steps the great body of the forces in Silesia obeyed next morning the order to march into Bohemia. Innumerable columns of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, soon thronged the passes in the mountains; and before the six days' delay allowed for the commencement of hostilities, after the termination of the armistice, had expired, eighty thousand Russian and Prussian veterans were grouped round the walls of Prague. The Emperor of Russia and King of Prussia arrived soon after in that city, where they were received with the utmost cordiality and magnificence by the Emperor of Austria; and a review of the principal forces of the latter on the 19th August, when ninety-one battalions of infantry, and fifty squadrons of cavalry, in all nearly ninety thousand men, defiled before their majesties, conveyed a vivid image of the vast accession of strength which their cause had received by this fortunate alliance. It was a gratifying spectacle to the English diplomatists-Lord Aberdeen, Lord Catheart, and Sir Charles Stewart, who had so powerfully contributed to bringing about this felicitous union—to behold the persevering efforts of their country, after twenty years of constancy and warfare, at length crowned by the formation of a league which promised speedily to effect the deliverance of Europe, and their patricule pride was not a little increased by the accounts which arrived next day of the defeat of Soult with immense loss, after a series of desperate battles in the Pyronees, and the expulsion of his army, after a second irruption, from the whole Snams territory (1).

It had long been fondly honed at Dresden, that the 15th August. of Napoleon the day of the fete of Napoleon, on which, according to the custom of Catholic countries, his birthday was held, would be the day on which the signature of the preliminaries of peace would be celebrated. As the armistice drew near to its termination, however, these hones were gradually dispelled; and at length an amperial order, that the fate should take place on the 10th, clearly revealed the presentment, that on the 15th the approaching resumption of hostilities would render such a display as was desired for the occasion impossible A grand review, however, took place on the former day, with all the eircumstance of military nome, at which the hing of Saxony, his brothers and nephews, and all the principal marshals and dignitaries of the empire, assisted. Napoleon, followed by this splendid cortige. passed the line, which was drawn up in the great plain of Ostra-Geliege, near Dresden, at the gallon; and afterwards the whole troops, who were collected at Dresden and its environs, defiled before him The multitude of uniforms. costumes, and nations, which were then assembled, strongly bespoke the heart-stirring nature of the contest which had thus roused the world against

t

for a moment the triumphant days of the empire. But though the solendour

٠,٠

of these rejoicings for a white diverted the attention and distracted the cares of the soldiers and entizens, they afforded no respite to the cares and anxiety of their chief; serious and thoughtful, he beheld the vast array defile before hilm, and immediately after the review terminated, shut himself up in his cabinet to resume the labours of diplomacy, which then were so threatening an aspect. Melancholy forebodings filled every breast: it was universally beheved that Austria had joined the alliance; no glowing order of the day, no heart-stirring proclamation, dispelled these fears, or called the troops to fresh victories; and next morning the rolling of the drums, which in every direction called the troops to their rallying points, the aides-de-camp hurrying to and fro, the clatter of artiflery and waggons through the streets, and the long columns of bayonets and lances which defiled through the gates, told but too plainly that war was again about to rekindle its flames. This review deserves to be noticed: It was the task that Napolenn over held of the Grand Army; disaster afterwards succeeded disaster too rapidly for the animating pageantry of military magnificence (2).

Shortly before the recommencement of hostilities, Aspoleon summered an old veteran of the revolution and the empire to bresden, whose selfish ambition and capacity for intrigue were too dangerous to be allowed to remain in his rear in the degrace into which he had fallen. Fought forthwith obeyed the summons, and on his way from Paris had an interview with Augereau at Mayence, who strongly expressed, with military energy, his conviction, that the obstinacy of Napoléon would speedily prove his ruin (1). The Emperor received him with cold civility: after the first compliments were over, they entered on the state of affairs; and Fouché had the boldness to tell him that he was fearful that five hundred thousand soldiers, supported by an insurgent population in rear, would compel him to abandon Germany. Napoléon immediately resumed his warlike air. "It is distressing," said he, "that a general discouragement has seized even upon the bravest minds. The question is no longer the abandonment of this or that province; our political supremacy, and with it our very existence, is at stake. If my physical power is great, my moral power is still greater: let us beware how we break the charm. Wherefore all these alarms? Let events take their course. Austria wishes to take advantage of my embarrassments to recover great advantages; but she will never consent to my total destruction, in order to surrender herself without a shield to the jaws of Russia. This is my policy; I expect that you are to serve me with all your power. I have named you Governor-general of Illyria; and it is you, in all probability, who will have to put the finishing hand with Austria. Set off; go by Prague; set on your well-known threads of secret negotiation, and thence travel by Gratz to Laybach. Lose no time, for poor Junot, whom you are to succeed, is decidedly mad. In my hands, Illyria is an advanced gnard in the heart of Anstria, a sentinel to keep the cabinet of Vienna right." Fonché made a profound obeisance, and straightway set ont. He was well aware that he was sent into honourable banishment; but he was too prudent to remonstrate against his destination. Before he arrived in his province, Junot, had displayed evident marks of insanity; the vexations consequent on the public reproaches addressed to him by the Emperor in Russia, joined to the rigours of its climate, and domestic embarrassments, had combined to destroy his understanding; and after Fouche's arrival he was sent back to France, where, in a fortnight after, he died in the house in which he had been born, having, in a paroxysm of madness, thrown himself from a window. Napoléon's early companions in arms were fast falling around him. Bessières, Duroc, and Junot, perished within a few months of each other; the stars which shone forth in the firmament eighteen years before on the Italian plains, in the first years of the Revolution, were rapidly sinking into the shades night (2).

The astute chief of the police, in passing through Prague, however, immediately commenced his usual system of underhand intrigue and selfish foresight. He saw clearly that it was all over with

(2) Fouché, ii. 198. 215. Capef. x. 184, 185. D'Abrantes, xvi. 278, 321.

Napoléon was deeply affected by the death of Junot; when he received the intelligence he exclaimed, "Voilà eneure un de mes braves de mains! Junot! O mon Dieu!" Shortly before his death Junot wrote a letter to the Emperor, which, amidst much excitement arising from commencing insanity, contained expressions strongly descriptive of the feelings entertained by his early emmpanions in arms at that period. "I, who love you with the admration of the savage for the sun—I, who live only in you—even I implore you to terminate this eternal war. Let us have peace. I would wish to repose my worn—out head, my pain-racked limbs in my house, in the midst of my family, of my children, of my friends. I desire to enjoy that which I have purchased with what is more precims than all the treasures of the Indies—with my bluod—the blood of an hunnurable man, of a good Frenchman. I ask tranquillity—purchased by twenty-two years of active service, and seventeen wounds, by which the blood has flowed, first for my country, then for your glory."—D'Abrantes, xvi. 323.

^{(1) &}quot;I received," said Augerean ito Fonché, "letters from headquarters immediately after the battle of Bautzen, and it appears that that harrible butchery led to no result: no prisoners, no cannon. In a cumtry extremely intersected with inclosures, we have found the enemy prepared or intrenched at every point; we suffered severely at the subsequent combat of Reichenbach Observe that, in that short campaign, one bullet has carried off Bessières on this side of the Elbe, and another, Duroc at Reichenbach What a war! we shall all be destroyed; what would he do at Dresden? He will not make peace; you know him better than I do. He will get himself surrounded by 500,000 men. No one can doubt that Austria will follow the example of Prussia. If he continues obstinate, and is not killed, which he will not be, we shall all be destroyed."—See Mémoires de Foucué, ii, 171, 172.

Napoléon, and deeming the opportunity favourable for setting on foot the threads of a negotiation, which might give him the means of escape in the general ruin, he opened to Mitternich in that city his ideas on the important part which the senate would come to play in the event of his fall. "Europe," and he, "rising en masse against Napoléon, cannot fail to occasion his overtirow; we must look to the future. A regency, with the Empress of its head, and Austria os its support, seems to afford the fairest chance of enecess; the members of the Bonaparte family must be pensioned and sent to travel; o re-

t
the chances of war." But this project on the part of the veteran regiende and revolutionist of Nantes, deserves to be recorded as the first germ of the vast consuracy which, in the end, precipitated Aspoléon from the throne (1) While Napoleon was thus providing, in the honourable exile of his old minister of police, for the security of his empire during the chances of war, another illustrious chief of the Revolution was again reanpearing on the theatre, and destined shortly to close his brilliant career in the ranks of his enemies. Moreat, ever since his trial and condemnation by the First Consul (2) in 1801, had lived in retirement in America, beholding the contest which still raged in Europe, as the slupwrecked mariner does the waves of the ocean from which he has just escaped. But the Emperor of Russia, who entertained the highest opinion of the republican general, deeming It not unlikely that he might be induced to lend the aid of his great military talents, to support the cause of Furopean freedom, had some time over iously opened a correspondence with him at Acy York; the result of which was that it was agreed as the basis of his co-operation, "that France should be maintained in the limits which it had acquired under the republic: that she should be allowed to choose her own government by the intervention of the senate and political bodies, and that as soon as the innertal tyranny was overturned, the Interests of the country should become paramount to those of the imperial family." In pursuance of these principles, it was agreed that Morean and Bernadotte should appear together on the banks of the libine. make an appeal to the exhausted army with the tricolor flag, and strive to overturn the tyranny which the 18th Brumaire had established. No sooner were these preliminaries agreed on, than Morrau embarked at New York, on loard the American ship Hannibal, and after a passage of thirty days, arrived at Cottenburg on the 27th July, from whence he humediately set out for Straigund to have an interview with Bernadotte (5)

Moreau's arrival on the shores of the failte was felt, as Marshalls seen, the Swedish commander, expressed it, "as a reinforcement of a hundred thousand men." He was received at Strained with the highest inhitary honours by Bernadotte, who, amilist the thunders of arrillery and the cheers of an immeose concourse of speciators, conducted hun to his herdquarters. But though the meeting between the hero of Hohenhaden and the old republican of the Sambre and Meuse was extremely corduly yet they experienced considerable embarrassment when they came to consult on the ulterior measures to be pursued in France, in the event of Sapo-

leon being dethroned. Morean, whose republican ideas had undergone no change by his residence in America, was clear for reverting to the constitution of 1792; and perhaps indulged the secret hope, that in such an event he might be called to an elevated place in its councils; Bernadotte, whose democratic principles had been singularly modified by the experience he had had of the sweets of royalty, inclined to a monarchical constitution; and nursed the expectation that the choice of the French people, as well as of the allied sovereigns, might fall on himself. But though the seeds of future and most serious discord might thus be perceived germinating in the very outset of their deliberations, yet common hatred of Napoléon kept them united in all objects of present policy; and after concerting, for three days, with perfect unanimity the plan of military operations, Morean set out for the allied headquarters in Bohemia (1).

Moreau's progress from Stralsund to Pragne was a continued triumph. Such was the greatness of his reputation, and the enthusiasm excited in the north of Germany by his joining the allied cause, that his journey resembled rather the progress of a heloved sovereign than that of a foreign, and at one period hostile general. The innkeepers refused to accept any thing from him for their entertainment; the postmasters hastened to offer him their best horses, and send on couriers to announce his approach; wherever he stopped, a crowd collected, eager to catch a glance of so renowned a warrior. At Berlin, not only the street in which the hotel was situated where he lodged was thronged with multitudes, but those even which opened into it; and during the few hours that he remained there, he was visited by the principal persons in that city. Nor was his reception at the allied headquarters, where he arrived late at night on the 16th Angust, less flattering. Early next morning he was visited by the Emperor Alexander, who lavished upon him every possible attention; and he was immediately admitted into the entire confidence of the allied sovereigns. "General Moreau," said Alexander, "I know your opinions; I will do nothing which can thwart them. France shall be allowed to pronounce itself-to show its power; I leave it perfectly free." His reception by the Emperor Francis was not less flattering, who publicly thanked the conqueror of Hohenlinden for the moderation he had displayed, and the discipline he had preserved, when in possession of a considerable part of his dominions. Moreau immediately began to study the maps for the campaign which was about to open; and it was very much by his advice that the grand attack on Dresden, which so soon ensued, and so nearly proved fatal to Napoléon, was adopted. On the 15th August, General Jomini, whose military writings have rendered him so celebrated, and who at that period occupied the situation of chief of the staff to Marshal Ney, chagrined at being refused the rank of general of division in the French army, to which his services entitled him, passed over to the Allies, and was most cordially received. Lecourbe was hourly expected; so that circumstances seemed to afford no small countenance to the favourité idea of Moreau, that it was possible to form a legion of thirty thousand men out of the French prisoners in Russia, who were reported to be ready to combat Napoléon, and that this force would form the nucleus of a host which would divide, under his command, with the Emperor the military forces of the French empire (2).

But how gratifying soever the arrival of such distinguished French officers appointment point of vital importance, which, if not terminated by the magnaniof a common mous self-denial of the party principally concerned, might, at the very outset, have proved fatal to the whole alliance. That one generalissimo was different armies. ciently evident: . . equally apparent. This point was convassed with the utmost apparent at the allied headquarters for some days before hostilities were resumed, and no small heat was evinced on both sides in the discussion. The Emperor Alexander openly and eagerly aspired to the supreme command, in which he was supported by the king of Prussia. His colossal power and great reputation, the unexampled sacrifices which he had made in combating the French cutperor, as well as the unparalleled successes with which his efforts had been crowned; his personal courage and tried energy of character-all conspired to give weight to his claim, which was strongly recommended by both Moreau and Jomini. It seemed difficult, indeed, to conceive on what grounds it could be resisted; the more especially as the Archduke Charles, the only general in the allied armies whose experience or exploits could render him a fit competitor for the situation, was kept at a distance by the unhappy dissonsions which for some years had prevailed in the Imperial family of Au-

they had suffered so much; and it was soon January e account, no cordial co-operation on their part could be hoped for, if the Fmperor Alexander were invested with the supreme command. In these circumstances, that generous and noble prince, though not without a severe pang, relinquished his claim to that elevated situation, and, from deference na conferred on Prince Schwartzenberg, who remained generated, prevented the alliance from falling to pieces, from the want of a real need, in the very outset of its operations.

> * Dury during near a to which they were exposed,

Nor was it only by the Emperor Alexander that disinterested concensity was displayed, on the trying occasion of arranging the tem bereit bereit gegeber ben glochwilde 20 1 be and and the first of the second of the second of the produced the facilities to be the

with which they laid aside, not only national enmities, but individual rivalry, and bent all their energies, without a thought of self, on forwarding the great objects of the confederacy. Alexander, discarding all thought of the supreme command, divided his force in nearly equal proportions between the three grand armies, and subjected them to the command of Schwartzenberg. who had invaded his dominions; of Blucher, who had hitherto been unfortunate in war; and of Bernadotte, who had taken so active a share in the first Polish war. Tauenzein and Bulow obeyed without a murmur the commands of the Prince-Royal of Sweden, whose sword had cut so deep into the vitals of Prussia at Jena and Lubeck; Langeron and Sacken cheerfully acted under the command of the veteran Prussian Blucher, as yet unknown to successful fame: Russia, the mainstay and soul of the alliance, whose triumpliant arms had clamged the face of Enrope, had not the command of one of the great armies; while Austria, the last to enter into the confederacy, and so recently in alliance with Napoléon, was entrusted with the general direction of the whole. On contrasting this remarkable unanimity and disinterestedness, with the woful dissensions which had paralysed the efforts, and marred the fortunes of all former coalitions, or the grasping ambition and eeaseless jealousies which at that very time brought disaster upon Napoléon's lieutenants in Spain, we perceive that it is sometimes well for nations, as well as for individuals, to be in affliction; that selfishness and corruption spring from the temptations of prosperity, as generosity and patriotism are nursed amidst the storms of adversity; and that the mixed condition of good and evil, is part of the system which the merey of Providence has provided in this world, against the consequences of the blended principles of virtue and wickedness which have descended to us from our first parents.

It is a singular, and to an Englishman highly gratifying circumence of Wellingstance to observe, in how remarkable and marked a manner the ton's suc-cess on the achievements of Wellington and his gallant army in Spain, operated allied cause at all the most critical periods of the struggle, in animating the exertions, or terminating the irresolution of the other powers which co-operated in the contest. When Russia, in silence, was taking measures to withstand the dreadful irruption which she foresaw awaited her from the power of France, and hesitated whether even her resources were adequate to the encounter, she beheld, in the defence of the lines of Torres Vedras, at once an example and a proof of the efficacy of a wise defensive system; when the negotiations between her and France were approaching a crisis, in May 1812, she was encouraged by the fall of Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajoz to persevere in resistance; on the eve of the battle of Borodino, she made her lines resound with the thunder of artillery for the joyous intelligence of the victory of Salamanca; during the circular march to Taroutino. she received support amidst the flames of Moscow from the fall of Madrid. Nor did the glorious events of the Peninsula in 1813, occur less opportunely to exercise a decisive influence on the fortunes of Europe: the intelligence of the overthrow of Vittoria arrived just in time to determine the vacillation, and add the strength of Austria to the alliance; that of the defeat of Soult in the Pyrences, to embolden the counsels and invigorate the arm of the allied army on the resumption of hostilities, after the armistice of Prague. Whether these remarkable coincidences were the result of accidental occurrence, or formed part of the fixed design of Providence for the deliverance at the appointed season of an oppressed world, it is not given to mortal eye to discover; but this much may with confidence be asserted, that they afford a memorable

CHAP LXX. จาก example of the all important truth, applicable alike to nations and individuals. that the only sure foundation for final success as to be found in the fearless discharge of duty that human eye cannot scan, nor human foresight discover, the mysterious threads by which an overruling nower works out ultimate reward for strengous, or ultimate retribution for ignoble conduct, and that, whatever may be the horrors of the wilderness through which they pass. ultimate salvation is decreed for that people, who, following the pillar of fire by night, and the nillar of cloud by day, resolutely persevere through every difficulty in the appointed nath of virtue

CHAPTER LXXI.

DELIVERANCE OF GERMANY.

ARGUMENT.

Spirit of the French Revolution-Causes of the vast Strength of the Passions it developed-Moral reaction which stops this unbridled Career-Causes of the extraordinary Full of the Revolutionary Power-First Operation of the Allies-Napoléon enters Bohemia-He turns aside into Silesia notwithstanding all St.-Cyr's efforts-Retreat of Macdonald in that province-Napoléon advances against Blucher, who falls back-Advance of the Allies upon Dresden-They approach that city-Important advantage gained by this movement-Napoleon returns towards Dresden-Reasons for that Movement-Ilis Instructions to Vandamme, who is despatched to Pirna-Entrance of the Fronch Guards into Dresden-Arrival of the Emperor after them-Formidahle Attack on the City by the Allies-Awful Aspect of the Allied Columns as they attacked Dresden-Success in the outset of the Allies-Sally at each Flank by Napoleon, which repels the, Attack-State of both Parties during the Night-Napoléon's Dispositions on the day following-Positions of the Allied Troops at that Period -Battle of the Twenty-seventh August-Total Defeat of the Austrian left by Murat-Operations on the French left-Wound of Moreau-Singular Manner in which he came by his Death-Council of War among the Allies, when it is resolved to retreat-Extraordinary Difficulties on the Line of March in the Rear-Aspect of the Field of Battle-Napoleon sets out in Pursuit-Great Ability displayed by him in this Battle-Result of the Action on hoth Sides—Glaring Errors of the Austrian Commander on this oceasion—Great Divisions at the Allied Headquarters-Movements of Vandamme against Ostermann-Great Interests dependent on the Contest between them-Battle of Culm, and heroic Resistance of the Russians-Vandamme remains firm on the next day-Dispositions of the Russians to attack him—Second Battle of Culm—Dreadful Struggle in the Defile of Tilnitz in the French Rear -Napoléon's Views at this Period for an Attack on Berlin-Manner in which he received the Accounts of the Disaster at Culm-Reflections on the real Causes of Vandamine's Destruction-Failure of all Attempts to exculpate Napoléon on this Point-Napoléon's Operations in Silesia at this Period-IIis Instructions to Maedonald, and his Movements-Simultaneous Advance of Blucher against Macdonald—Battle of the Katzbach—Defeat of Souliam on the French left-Continuation of the Battle on the Right and Centre-Great Successes of the Allies, on the following Day-Disaster of Puthod's Division-Results of the Battle-Refleetions on the Conduct of the Generals on both sides-Operations against Dernadotte-Napoleon's great Anxiety for success over him-Advance of Ondinot against him, and Preparations for a Battle-Battle of Gross Beeren-Defeat of the French Centre there-Results of the Battle-Its subsequent Effects-Vast moral Influence of these Successes of the Allies-Defensive Measures of Napoléon for the Protection of Saxony-Ile advances in person against Blueher-Ney's Movements at the same time against Bernadotte-Battle of Dennewitz-Arrival of Ney with his Centre on the Field-The Arrival of Bernadotte with the Swedish Reserve decides the Victory-Operations of Davoust and Walmoden on the Lower Elbe-Walmoden destroys the French division Peeheux-Reasons which now led to a ehange of the Seat of War by Napoleon—Deplorable Condition of the French in Torgau, Dresden, and the Fortresses on the Elbe—Dreadful Effect of their distresses on the Condition of the French Army—Situation of the Allies—Their Plans at this Period—Movements of Blueher across the Elbe, in conformity-with their Plan of Operations-Movements of Bernadotte and Schwartzenberg-Napoleon's Views at this Period-His admirable military Ideas expressed to St.-Cyr-He afterwards alters his Plan-Sets out to join Ney, and leaves St.-Cyr at Dresden-Where he is soon surrounded by the enemy-Napolcon advances against Blueher, who joins Bernadotte-Their united Armies march to the West, and pass Napoléon, who prepares to cross the Elbe, and invade Prussia-False Counter-movement of Bernadotte towards the Elbe-Advance of the Grand Allied Army towards Leipsie-Napoleon's Project for earrying the War into Prussia-His Interviews with his Marshals, and Reasons for his advancing to Berlin-The Defection of Bavaria overturns this Project-Fearful Dangers with which Napoleon was now environed-Universal Joy with which the French Army received the Orders to move towards Leipsie-Description of that Town and its Environs-Napoleon's Preparatory Inspection of the Field of Battle-Positions of the French Army around Leipsic, and their Position and Force to the North of that Town-Positions of the Grand Allied Army-Their Positions to the South of Leipsie-Forces and

Position of the Allies to the North of that Twwn—Schwartzenberg's Proclamation to be Troops, and feelings of the Solders on both sades—Commencement of the Patile, and cerly Successof the Allies—Aspoleon prepares a Grand Attack upon the enemy's Centre—Schanitzenberg's Messacret to import in 4—Despretae Cavatry Action in the Contro—Cachaut Manbourg's vehement Charge to the East of Wachau—Whele is defeated by Alexander in Procon—trartal of the Austina Reserves on the Field—Aspoleon's bast effort—Last Alliek of Meerfeldi—Which is Repuleed, and he is made Prisoner—Operation to Gilday at Inde-Amalonical Cachaut Manbourg's Conference with Meerfeldi, whom he send back with Secret Proposits to the Allies—Monrial Night at Aspoleon's Englander The Allies defer the Attack till the Lighteenth—Dangerous State of Affors to Ampoleon the North of Lepsac—Victorus efforts of Lorder Schwartzenbergers in Napoleon's Englander of the Attack Commencement of the Patile, and Success of the Allies—On their left—for the Attack—Commencement of the Patile, and Success of the Allies on their left—for the Attack—Commencement of the Patile, and Success of the Allies on their left—for the Attack—Commencement of the Patile, and Success of the Allies on their left—

Murat leaves him—Stay of the French Army at Lefurth—Reorganization of the I rench Army—Their continued Retreat, and Pursuit of the Alties—Blatch of Wrede and the Revenue to the Rhime—Forces with which Species advanced against him—Peterpilon of the Field of Fattle at Blazus—Advantages and Weathers of Wrede's Position there—Commencement of the Action, and forcing of the Passage by 180 French —Position and Jangee of Napides and Special Review and Recapture of Hanni on the Thirty—against the Danes, and Armistice with them-Operations of Sh-Car and Tolsloy before Dresden-The Blockade of which is resumed after the Pattle of Leipsle-Vierrable condition and Difficulties of St.-Cyr-It ha at length Surrenders-Terms of the Capitulation, which are violated by the Allied Generals-Reflections on the Ereach of Convention on their Part-Lord London I-rry prevents a similar Capitulation being granted to Davous!-Fall of Stettin-here and Fall of Torgan-Operations before Dantac during 1813-Decrtions there till the Commencement of the regular alege in October-Continuation of the fire, and Fall of the Place-Capitelation of Jamose and Modlin on the Vistula, and general Results of the Campaign-Insurrection in Holland in favour of the Stadtholder and House of Drange-The I reach loke is universally thrown off-ind they are expelled from the Country-Operations in Italy during the Carrain - Porces and Positions of the contenting Armies-The Austrians commence the Campaign, and gain considerable Successes-Able Measures, and tibelinate Besistance of the Viceroy-General results of the Campai,n-Which throws the I rench behind the Adl .. - Rell ctions on this memorable Campaign -An I on the military ability displayed by Sapoleon fo ft-Ilis prose an I inexensable faults -Great talents shown in it by the Affred Ge ierals-Memorable example of Moral Retribution which it affords.

spanding Tur Freuch Revolution was not so much a revolt against the goleton has been rement and institutions, as the morality and faith of former times. It professed to effer new motives of action, new rewards of courge, new inducements to exertion to enancipated man. The old restraints of precept, dart, religion, were to be abolashed. The rule of action was to be, not what is right but what is exceedible; not what duty enjoins but what passion desires; not what is promised ultimate reward in another world, but what was attended in this with invendent gratification, Seddously fannes. the passions, it invariably neglected the conscience; often using the language of virtue, it as uniformly directed the actions of vice. The incalculable influence of generous affection—the elevating influence of noble sentiments, was neither overlooked nor underrated by its leaders; on the contrary, they entered largely into their policy for the government of the world. They were considered as the appropriate, and often the most efficacious means of rousing mankind; as instruments never to be despised, but on the contrary largely used for effecting the purposes of democratic elevation or selfish ambition. But it never for an instant entered into their contemplation, that these sentiments were to occasion any restraint upon their conduct; that the limitations which they so loudly proclaimed should be imposed on the power of others, should be affixed to their own; or that they should ever be called to forego present objects of ambition or gratification from an abstract sense of what is right, or a submissive obedience to the Divine commands. Hence its long-continued and astonishing success. While it readily attracted the active and enterprising by the brilliant prizes which it offered and the agreeable relaxation from restraint which it held forth, it enlisted at the same time the unwary and unforeseeing even in the opposite ranks, by the generous sentiments which it breathed, and the perpetual appeals to noble feelings which it made; and thus with almost superhuman address it combined in its ranks the energy of the passions and the sacrifices of the affections, the selfishness of matured and far-seeing sin, and the generosity of deluded and inexperienced virtue.

The vehement passions which the prospect of unrestrained indulvast strength of the Revo. gence, whether of pleasure, gain, or power, never fails to excite, lationary passions. the ardent desires which it awakens, the universal energy which it calls forth-are for a time irresistible; and if experience and suffering were not at hand to correct these excesses, and restore the moral equilibrium of nature, it is hard to say how the career of iniquity could be stopped, save by a special interposition of avenging power, or the mutual destruction of the wicked by each other. All the passions of the Revolution, in its different stages, were the passions of sin; the strength it displayed was no other than the energy which, anterior even to human creation, was arrayed against the rule of Omnipotence. The insatiable thirst for power which characterized its earlier stages; the unbounded desire for sensual gratification which succeeded its disappointment; the lust of rapine which sent its armies forth to regenerate by plundering all mankind; the passion for glory which sacrificed the peace and blood of nations to the splendour of the power of one ruling people—were so many directions which, according to the circumstances of different periods, the same ruling principle, the thirst for illicit gratification, successively took. The sober efforts of industry—the simple path of duty—the heroic self-denial of virtue-were insupportable to men thus violently excited; nothing short of the spoils of the world could gratify passions excited by the prospect of all its indulgences. When Satan strove to tempt, our Saviour, and reserved for the trial his strongest allurements, he led him up to an exceeding high mountain, and showed him all the kingdoms of the earth, and offered to give him them all if he would fall down and worship him. Memorable words! indicating at once the continued agency of the great adversary of mankind on individual conduct, and the pre-eminent strength of the temptations to achieve his conquests which were to be drawn from the social or national passions.

"Experience," says Dr. Johnson, "is the great test of truth, and is perpetually contradicting the theories of men." It is by the ultimate consequences Hard one to their actions that the efernal distinction between virtue and vice is made apparent, and the reality of Divine superintendence brought home to the universal conviction of men. There is a li-

end proves me

two thousand;

city, "Lo, these are the ungodiy, these prosper in the world, and these have riches in possession and I said. Then have I cleaned my heart in vain, and washed munchands in unpocomes. Al and chastened every morning Nea, a thought I to understand this; but it was too hard for me, until I went into end I vea, even like as a dream when one awaked; so shall thou make their palasticals image to vanish out of the city." Of whom were these words spoken? I of those in the days of Bavid or of Aapoléon? Twenty years of almost unbroken prosperity had reared up and consolidated the mighty fibring of the Prenchempure, and no power on earth seemed capable of vertirowing It Despite the catastrophe of the Moscow campaign, the genus of the Fimperor had again brought victory to the tricolor standards. The triumph of Luiten and Blautzen had steaded the wavering fidelity of his albes, and rearmanted the spirit of his people; and four hindred thousand bravenen were arrayed around his eagles on the Elle, to assert and maintain the dominion of the world Never, save on the Niemen, had Aapoléon seen himself at the head of such a force: Avere had Europe beheld such a host assembled over its whole hreadthy for the subjugation of its independence. Within two mouths from the resumption of hostilities the colossal structure was overthrown; the Freich for their deny (14000) and in (12 1 common of the mighty conqueror was cast away in minute sovereignty on o petty island, and the glores of the Besolution were numbered among the things that have been.

The way in which this extraordinity retribution was brought assert about, now appears descend in colours of supersthable helds. It was the same false and vicious principle, pushed to its necessary consequences, which produced the internal calamites and external disasters of the literolution, by promising and affording inhomodic gratitication to the passions and desires, without any regrid to the mode in which it has to be obtained, that great convisions arrayed on astonishing force of energy and talent on its adic; and if these indulgences rould have been obtained without involving the ruin or destruction of others, it is hard to say where the carrest of self-sh arisation would have stopped. But honest Industry, laborious exertion, virtuous self-denial alone, can purchase lame most enjournest; assummary and short-hand modes of obtaining, them without much efforts, necessarily mische the injury of others. Robbery and plunder, accordingly, realed under the successfue and specious names of laberty, patriotium, and exhausted, and the armies raised by these infernal methods, let loose to pillage and oppress all the adjoining states, had failed in extorting the requisite supplies, even the commons of the poor and the hospitals of the sick were at last confiscated under the imperial government. With those who were enriched by these iniquitous methods, indeed, this system was in the highest degree popular; but in all cases of robbery, there are two parties to be considered-the robber and the victim of his violence. The long continuance and wide extent of this juiquity at length produced an universal spirit of exasperation: resistance was commenced almost by instinct, and persisted in when it appeared hopeless. From the ice of Kamschatka to the Pillars of Hercules; from the North Cape to the shores of Calabria-all nations were now convulsed in the effort to shake off the tyranny of France: a crusade greater than had been collected either by the despotism of Asia in ancient, or the feryour of Europe in more modern times, was raised for the deliverance of mankind; and sixteen hundred thousand men on the two sides appeared in arms in Germany, Spain, and Italy, to decide the desperate conflict between the antagonist principles of Vice striving for a liberation from all restraints, linman and divine, and Religion enjoining the authority of duty and obedience to the commands of God. The world had never beheld such a contest: if we would seek a parallel to it, we must go back to those awful images of the strife of the heavenly powers, darkly shadowed forth in Scripture, to which the genius of Milton has given poetic and terrestrial immortality.

The armistice was denounced on the 11th, but by its conditions, six days more were to clapse before hostilities could be resumed. It was an object, however, for the Allies to have their preparations complete for action the moment that the prescribed period arrived; and accordingly, on the 12th, the Russian and Prussian troops, in pursuance of the concerted plan of operations, began to defile in great strength by their left into Bohemia. The junction with the Austrian troops in the plains of Jung-Buntzlau, raised the allied force in that province to two hundred and twenty thousand men; but though this host was in the highest degree formidable, both from its numbers and the admirable quality of the troops of which the greater part of it was composed, yet considerable part of the Austrians were new levies, as yet unused to war; and the variety of nations of which it was composed, as well as the want of any previous habit of eo-operation among each other, or uncontrolled direction in its head, rendered the success of any important operations undertaken in the outset of the campaign very doubtful. Hostilities were commenced by the Allies on the side of Silesia before the six days had expired. Taking advantage of some trifling infractions of the armistice by the French troops, the allied generals on the 14th sent a corps to take possession of Breslau, which lay in the neutral territory between the two armies, and was likely immediately to fall into the enemies hands on the resumption of hostilities; on the day following, Blueher advanced in great force across the neutral territory, and every where drove in the French videttes; and the French troops, surprised in their cantonments, hastened to fall behind the Bober (1).

Napoléon enters Bohemia. Aug. 17. No sooner was the Emperor informed of the resumption of hostilities on the Silesian frontier, than he set out from Dresden, and the first night slept at Gorlitz. As he was stepping into his carriage, two persons from different quarters arrived; Narbonne from Prague, with the account of the final rupture of the negotiations, and Murat from Naples, with the offer of his redoubtable sword. Napoléon had a conference of an hour in duration with the former, whom he despatched with the proposal for the continuance of negotiations during hostilities, which, as already mentioned, proved ineffectual (1), and then set out, with the hing of Naples, in his carriage. Though well aware of the vacillation which Murat had evinced in command of the army in Poland, and of the opening which he had made towards negotiation with the allied powers, the Emperor had the magnanimity to forgive it all, and he was again invested with the command of the cavalry, in which service he was, in truth, unrivalled Uncertain on which side the principal attacks of the Albes were likely to be directed, and having lumself no fixed plan of operations, Napoléon established his guard and reserve eavalry at Gorlitz and Attan, watching the movements of his adversaries, and prepared to strike whenever they made a falso movement, or afforded him an opportunity of falling upon them with advantage. Fifty thousand men, in three columns, crossed the mountain frontier of Bohemia, and established themselves in the Austrian territories at Gabel, Rombourg, and Reschemberg, while the feeble Austrian detachments, which were stationed at that point under Count Neipperg, fell back, still skilfully screening their rear, on the road to Prague (2)

Napoleon's movements at this time were based upon the idea, to 8 lests not which he obstinately adhered till it had wellnigh proved his ruln, that the great effort of the Albes would be made on the side of Silesia, and that it was there that the first decisive strokes of the campaign were to be struck. He persevered in this behef, even after he had become acquainted, by his erruption into Bohemia, with the march of the grand Russian and Prussian army into that province, and their concentration under the immediate eye of the allied sovereigns round the nalls of Prague All the efforts of Marshal St -Cyr to convince him that this was the quarter from which danger was to be apprehended, that so great an accumulation of force in Hohemia would not have been made without some serious design, and that the French would soon find their quarters straitened in the neighbourhood of Torgau and Dresden, were in vain (5) Deaf to these arguments, and uninfluenced even by the obvious confirmation which they received from the march of the Bussians and Prassians in such force into Bolicmia, Napoléon persisted in believing that it was on the Bober and tho hatzbach, now comparatively stripped of troops, that he should commence operations, and assuring St -Cyr, who was left at Pirna with thirty thousand men, in command of the passes leading from Pohemia to Dresden, that he had nothing to fear, that Vandamine would come to his assistance if the enemy threatened hum in consulerable force, and that, if necessary, he himself would return with his guard and assemble a hundre I and sixty thousand men round the walls of that city, he ordered the whole troops under his immediate command to wheel to the left, and defile towards Silesia (4)

^{{1} Aur la p *00 {2 la a ii 239 249 CE | 1 279 *13

the second of th

executs a thin a of front sleage the public law that the first meaning urons triencherg and state feel credit and Targue so me hely introduce large themselves anomal Lower cere if they should bet succeed in tables there lost users in to rend if all agrant shants impossible in the a to be tred if they are keepen and the product of the second of the meaning of the second of the meaning of the second of the ad much byen breaden by the left bank the

Meanwhile Blueher was vigorously pressing on the French army in Silesia, which, not being in sufficient strength to resist his formidable masses, was every where falling back before him. Lauriston was pushed by the Russians under Langeron; Ney, by the corps of Sacken; Marmont and Macdonald by the Prussians, under Blueher and D'York. Such was the vigour of the pursuit, that ground was rapidly lost by the French in every direction. Ney fell back on the night of the 17th from Leignitz to Hanau; next day the Katzbach was passed at all points; on the 48th, Blueher established his headquarters at Goldberg, while Sacken occupied Leignitz. Still the Allics pressed on: Langeron on the left passed the Bober at Zobten, after routing a detachment which occupied that point; in the centre, Blucher, with his brave Prussians, obliged also Lauriston to recross it; while Ney, in like manner, was obliged to evacuate Buntzlau, and fall back across the same stream. Thus, at all points, the French force in Silesia was giving way before the enemy; and it was of sinister augury that the gallant generals at its head did not feel themselves strong enough to withstand his advance (1): for it was an army which Napoleon estimated at a hundred thousand men, which was thus receding without striking a blow (2).

But the arrival of the heads of the columns of guards and cavalry, advance commanded by Napoléon in person, which were directed with all possible expedition to the left, through the Bohemian mountains towards Buntzlau, soon changed the state of affairs in this quarter.

No sooner did they appear than the retreat of Ney's army was stopped; and the soldiers, with joy, received orders to wheel about and march against the enemy. The indefatigable activity of the Emperor communicated itself to the troops: all vied with each other in pressing forward to what it was hoped would prove a decisive victory; and infantry, cavalry, and artillery, with the imperial guard at their head, poured in an impetuous, yet regulated, torrent down the valleys of the Bohemian mountains, and inundated the Aug. 20. Silesian plains. Such was Napoléon's anxiety to press forward, that he outstripped even the eavalry of the guard, and arrived at Laubau, in advance of Gorlitz, with hardly any of his attendants around him. By daybreak On the following morning he was on the banks of the Bober, and entered Lowenberg with the advanced guards; the bridge which the Prussians had broken down was restored under the fire of artillery; Lauriston, in face of the enemy, recrossed the river, and advanced, with a constant running fire in front, to the gates of Goldberg. Blueher continuing his retreat on the fol-general Vandamme will come to its relief; you will then have under your order 60,000 men in the camp of Dresden on the two banks. The troops in the camp at Zittau, become disposable in that event, will also hasten there; they will arrive in four days, and raise your force to 100,000. I will come with my Gnard, 50,000 strong; and in four days we shall have from 160,000 to 180,000 men round its walls. It is nf no consequence though they cut me off from France: the essential point is, that I should not be cut nff from Dresden and the Elhe. The army of Silesia, which is from 130,000 to 140,000 men, without the Guard, may be reinforced by that corps d'elite, and raised to 180,000. They will debouche against Wittgenstein, Blueher, and Sacken, who, at this moment, are marching against our troops at Buntzlan: as soon as I have destroyed or disabled them, I will be in a situation to restore the equilibrium by marching upon Berlin, or taking the Austrians in rear in Bohenia. All that is not as yet clear; Int one thing is sufficiently clear, that you cannot torn 400,000 men, posted under cover of a chain of fortified places, and who can debouche at pleasure by Dresden, Targau, Wittenberg, nr Magdeburg. All you have to dn is, th dispute the ground, gain time, and preserve Dresden, and to maintain active and constant communications with General Vandamine."—Narmion to Sr.-Cra, 17th August 1813; Sr.-Cra, iv. 375; Pièces Just.

^{· (1)} Bout. viii. 10. Fain, ii. 243, 244, Join. iv. 370.

^{(2) &}quot;My cousin—Inform the Duke of Tarentum, (Macdonald,) that I have put under his orders the army of the Bober, which is composed of 100,000 men, infantry, cavalry, artillery, and engineers included."—Narollos's Instructions to Beating for MacDinald, 23d August 1813. St.-Cyr, iv. 374; Pièces Just, lowing day, the Katzbach also was passed, and the whole army of Silesia concentrated around Jauer. But the retreat of the Allies, though decidedly pronounced, was far from being a flight; with admirable skill they took advantage of every favourable position to cheek the pursuit, and give time to the columns to rear to return in order; and in several severa actions, especially one in front of Goldberg, inflicted a very severe loss mon the enemy. Such was the magnitude of the forces employed on both sides, and the extent of ground over which hostilities were carried on, that although they had only lasted five days, and no general engagement had taken place. each party were already weakened by full six thousand men. Appoleon expected the greatest satisfaction at the result of this day's operations, and at thus seing so great a mass of the enemy's forces retreating before him in the very outset of the campaign: yet cooler observers in the French army remarked, that the place of the allies was saggeously designed, and skilfully executed, when they had thus early succeeded in attracting Napoléon to whichever side they chose, and yet avoided the risk of an encounter when the chances were no longer in their favour (1).

In truth, Blucher's advance, and subsequent retreat were part of the general policy of the Allies for the conduct of the campaign laid down at Trachenberg, and developed with remarkable precision in his instructions (2); and Napoleon, in consequence of it, and from the descending, with their whole disposable force, from Bohemia upon Saxony and Dresden, and thus striking at the enemy's communications, and the heart of his poner, at the very time when the Emperor himself, with the flower of his army, was far advanced in Silesia in pursuit of the retiring enlumns of Blucker. At the time when Napoléon was driving the last corps of the army of Silesia across the Bober, the grand army of the Alhes, two hundred thousand strong, broke up from their cantonments in liehemia, and began to cross the Erzegebirge mountains; all the basses into Saxony being soon crowded with the innumerable host. To oppose this formidable myasion, there was no force immediately available but that of St . Cyr, stationed at Pirms, which numbered only twenty-two thousand men present with the eagles on the frontier, though its nominal amonot was thirty thousand. Vandanime's corps. of greater strength, and Poniatonski's Poles, were within a few days' march, at the entrance of the passes towards /itlau more, by means of a corps of 1 ght rander to here up the communication is the series of course to

I should like high curps at Landebat is it should if it error been up the summer throw is the street of but recent the forteriors of business much be adequately derrotend, thely I was the tentere merganery Especialists, thereby the lead-size and the many arry wat jets on proxime a Tan-pline, with its latronized cases, which much by a map pipe planetee of distance, which much by a depose only, the or the stony of E-brane and the of the Promoting of the Stony of E-brane and the major to the stony of the stony of the stony major the stony of the stony of the stony major the stony of the stony of the stony of the Primary of the stony of the Primary of the Primary of the Stony of the Primary of the Stony of the Primary of the Stony of the Stony of the Primary of the Stony of the Stony of the Stony of the Primary of the Primary of the Stony of the Stony of the Stony of the Stony of the Primary of the Stony o Ental of Dorces, at on Betha tie arme of 6 intel to in promote the reference and the bulk of the sound Substance that p git hand of the Line that of his tested it has been on the left head, and account to been Men tests Bureauguste date if it may it does in $11.

⁽¹⁾ Odd, 1, 261, 214 First. 10 11 Fore, in 241 245 Lab 1 201 30? (3 "Should the resear return an intertion be make to report on intal bone a, or in ettach the army of the Frince Forel of Sandon the genra of 5 irus will andresour to sayode his oper tions as much so pur libral or yet and grow mut to seging superior locces. Fe neder to arrive at that of not at at I be becoming to large the means to the ad stated get d and this to be to and aborton him asserted get d and the process him less straight assert him less straight as a second straight assert him less straight as a second straight a entrichment a thick moves in superior force and the artest force from d rest b a person pull furera age not the array of 5 for ate it will endersune to arrest b as as bong de posallor that having door on operate its priced to me.
the Trium, tak og operati over one to energenesse
I thately In that event the event of toward backet and arrend stuff also the later and tale mes and Gabel, leading into Silesia; but they could not be relied on to co-operate in any sudden attack on the capital. But, meanwhile, the danger was instant and pressing on the 21st. Barclay de Tolly and Wittgenstein presented themselves in great strength before the barriers, on the heights of Peters-Aug. 22. walde which they speedily forced, and laid open the great road from Prague to Dresden. The Prussians, under Kleist, farther to the left, descended from the mountains upon Gotlenb and Dolma; while the great masses of the Austrians, with the imperial headquarters, moved by the roads of Altenberg and Sayda on Dippodiswalde; while, on the extreme left, Colloredo, Chastellar, Giulay, and Klenau, poured down from the Marienberg hills, and, directing their advance upon Freyberg, threatened entirely to intercept the communication between Dresden and the Rhine (1).

St.-Cyr had from the beginning conjectured, from the perfect stillness of the allied army along the whole Bohemian frontier, contrasted with the incessant rattle of tirailleurs which Blueher kept up in front of his line, that the real attack was intended to be made outside of Dresden; but having been unable to get the Emperor to share his opinion, he was left alone to make head against the torrent. Too experienced, however, to attempt to withstand so vast a force with the comparatively few troops at his disposal, he contented himself with impeding their advance as much as possible; and, after some sharp encounters with Wittgenstein's advanced guard, withdrew within the redoubts of Dresden, while Wittgenstein occupied the town of Pirna, and the allied headquarters were advanced to Dippodiswalde. Schwartzenberg's original intention was not to have moved on Dresden, but to have directed the main body of his force on Freyberg, with a view to a combined operation with Bernadotte in the neighhourhood of Leipsic; and it was only after arriving at Marienberg on the 23d, that this plan was abandoned. Without doubt, the movement upon Dresden promised infinitely greater and more immediate results than an advance into the plains of Saxony; but it was owing to the time lost in this murch and countermarch, that the failure of the operation was owing; for if their whole force had from the first marched direct upon Dresden, they would have arrived before its walls on the evening of the 23d, and it would have been carried by assault on the day following, thirty hours before the nearest of Napoleon's troops could have come up to its relief (2).

Important As it was, the Allies, had now accomplished the greatest feat in strategy: they liad thrown themselves in almost irresistible strength upon the enemy's communications, without compromising their own. Nothing was wanting but vigour in following up the measure, adequate to the ability with which it had been conceived; and Dresden would have been taken, a corps of the French army destroyed, and the defensive position on the Elbe, the base of Napoléon's whole positions in Germany, broken through and paralyzed. But to attain these great objects, the utmost vigour and eclerity in attack were indispensable; for Napoléon was at no great distance on the right bank of the Elbe, and it might with certainty be anticipated, that as soon as he was made aware of the danger with which the centre of his power was threatened, he would make the utmost possible exertions to come up to its relief. The Allies arrived, however, in time to gain their object so far. Notwithstanding the unnecessary detour towards Freyberg, part of their army arrived in the neighbourhood of Dresden on the evening of the 23d (5), and next morning the trembling inhabitants of that beautiful city beheld the smiling hills around their walls resplendent with bayonets, and studded with a portentous array of artillery. During the whole of the 2 file, the troops, who were extremely fatigued, continued to arrive; and on the morning of the 25th, a hundred and twenty thousand men, with above five hundred pieces of cannon, were to the close viennity of the enemy's posts, reported that the coast was creat, and strongly supported the same advice. Alexander was clear for adopting it, but Schwartzenberg and the Austrans, accustomed only to the methodical habits of former wars, and insensible to the inestimable importance of time in combating Aspolcon, insisted upon deferring the atlack till klenau's corps, which, being on the extreme left, had not yet arrived from Freyberg, should be in line. This opinion prevailed, as the most lukewarm and timed invariably does with all medl assemblies of men on whom a serious responsibility is thrown; the atlack was deferred till the following afternoon, which is curassiers and guards, learing points (2).

(3) " Dresden, 23d August 1813, Ten at night .-

⁽¹⁾ St.-Cyr, iv. 78, 80. Fain, ii. 252, 253. Bout. (2) St.-Cyr, lv. 85, 86. Bout. 26, 27. Fain, ii. 24, 25. Iab. i. 307. (2) St.-Cyr, lv. 85, 86. Bout. 26, 27. Fain, ii. 252, 253. Jom. iv. 380.

ed intelligence of the movements of ward price on the 25d; and after guing the command of the army desimed to combat Blucher to Marshal Macdonald, retraced his steps the same day, ac-and did not ride like Berthier in an easy carriage, though animated wait me same spirit, were by no means equally confident they were ready to sink under their excessive fatigue, having marched since the renewal of hostilities nearly ten leagues a day; and, such was their exhaustion, that the Emperor ordered twenty thousand bottles of wine to be pureliased at Goritz, and distributed among the guards alone. Segreat, however, was the exhaustion of the country, from having so long been the seat of war, that hardly a tenth part of that number could be procured, and the greater part of the wearred men continued their mirch without any other than the seanty supplies which they could theuselves extract by terror from the Inhabitants. Napoléon continued his march in the middle of his guards all the 2th, and hitled at Bautzen; and there took his determination to continue his march direct upon Dresden, or more to the left upon Press, and theretin the communications.

Al for the afternoon the surmy approached Dreader, after himse delives to make analyty. We as peried as attack this orining and probably is will take the towardown. Their Dispits' home better that after towardown. Their Dispits' home better to have done and the require for heary art they to have done and more wall and patients. The Copp. Viconius, 22d Agrant 1813 Sunday, is,

(4) WAs immerae draw, compared of Resource, Pretions and Astripac, is at the memoral all around Breaken to the pred piece trace of action for From the root amount of Lern which he has contented it would appear that the nomes is determined to haired on ottach, however has work Majority is not for nil. though perhaps not suspering that you are so ment as you principle. We are determined to do a 1 lease power; but I san seases for match agmore with only some political mate Coast Sustains 21th topic 1812 Milesoft St. Las in 281-220.

12) Road 27 Jone 20 327 329 91. Car is 85. 12) Road 2

The preceding account of what perced before Preciden on the Tich, as easier youth much before measter details on the subject 2 hours when precident from my highly estemand and apparable from the details of the subject theoret.

and rear of the Allies, according to the information he might receive as to whether or nor that capital, unaided, could hold out till the 28th (1).

Early on the following morning, the Emperor resumed his march, still keeping the road which led alike to Dresden and Pirna, with the design of throwing himself, if possible, on the rear of the Allies. Having, however, the day before, dispatched General Gourgaud to Dresden (2) to obtain information as to the state of the city, he halted, according to agreement, at Stolpen, where the road to Dresden branches off from that to Bohemia, and there received the most alarming intelligence as to the state of affairs in the Saxon eapital. The letters both of Murat and St.-Cyr left no room for doubt that the city was in the most imminent danger; that the aecidental delay in the attack had alone hitherto preserved it; and that its fall might hourly be looked for. At eleven at night Gourgaud returned, and confirmed the intelligence, adding, that it was surrounded by so vast an army, that not a chance remained of holding out another day but in the immediate return of the Emperor. Already the lines of investiture extended from Pirna to Plauen, and nothing but the arrival of Klenau, the approach of whose columns was already announced, was wanting, to enable the enemy to complete the circle to the Lower Elbe. Preparations were already made for evaeuating the Gross Garten: the glare of a village in flames immediately behind it, threw an ominous light on the domes of Dresden; and when Gourgaud left the city shortly after dark, the whole heavens to the south and west were resplendent with the fires of the enemy's bivouacs (5).

Napoléon now saw that affairs were urgent: there was not a moment to be lost if Dresden was to be saved, and the communications of the army preserved. He instantly sent for General Haxo, the celebrated engineer, and thus addressed him :--" Vandamme is beyond the Elbe, near Pirna: he will find himself on the rear of the enemy, whose anxiety to get possession of Dresden is evidently extreme. My design was to have followed up that movement with my whole army: it would, perhaps, have been the most effectual way to have brought matters to an issue with the enemy; but the fate of Dresden disquiets me. I cannot bring myself to sacrisice that town. Some hours must elapse before I can reach it; but I have deeided, not without regret, to change my plan, and to march to its relief. Vandamme is in sufficient strength to play an important part in that general movement, and infliet an essential injury on the enemy. Let him advance from Pirna to Gieshubel; and gain the heights of Peterswalde; let him maintain himself there, occupy all the defiles, and from that impregnable post await the issue of events around Dresden. To him is destined the lot of receiving the sword of the vanquished; but he will require sang-froid: above all, do not let him be imposed upon by a rabble of fugitives. Explain fully my intentions to Vandamme; tell him what I expect from him. Never will he have a finer opportunity of earning his marshal's baton." Haxo immediately set out; descended from the heights of Stolpen into the gorges of Lilienstein; joined Vandamme, and never again quitted his side (4).

⁽¹⁾ Fain, ii. 256, 257. Bout. 30. Odel. i. 218,

^{(2) &}quot;To morrow," said Napoléon to General Gourgaud, "I will be on the road to Pirna, but I will stop at Stolpen. Set you out immediately for Dresden; ride as hard as you can, and be there this evening; see St.-Cyr, the King of Naples, and the King of Saxony; re-assure every one. Tell them to-morrow I can be in Dresden with 40,000 men, and the day following arrive there with my whole army. At daybreak visit the redoubts and outposts; consult the commander of engineers as to whether they can hold out. Return to me as quickly as possible to-morrow at Stolpen, and report well the opinion of Maret and St. Cyr, as to the real state of things,"—FAIN, ii. 256.

(3) Fain, ii. 257, 258. St. Cyr, iv. 98, 99.
(4) Fain, ii. 259, 260.

922 By daybreak on the following morning, the whole troops around V----the First the Emperor's headquarters were in motion, and defiling on the road to Dresden. Descrite their excessive fatures having marched forty leagues in four days, they pressed ardently forward; for now the canconviers who succeeded each other not speedily arrive the city was los . .

ray: next came Latour Maubourg's hellerman's cavalry; while Marmont's corps moved in a parallel line on the direct road from Bautzen, which they had never left. At eight o'clock, the advanced guard reached the elevated plateau where the roads of Rautzen, of Stolnen, and of Poinitz intersect each other, shortly before the entry of the new town of Dresden, and from which the eye can survey the whole plant on the other side of the Elbe. With what anxiety did they behold it entirely filled by an innumerable host of enemies, and the hostile columns so near the advanced works, that an assault might every instant be expected! Already the Prossian uniforms were to be seen in full possession of the Gross Carten : columns of attack were forming within cannon-shot of the suburb of Pirna; 1 - 1 - of the Film Waterestein had constructed batteries to cu-nutal Dresilen was was not enveloped. and the works, but their numbers appeared a handful in the midst or one interminable lines of the beleaguering host; and a silence more terrible than the roar of artiflery. bespoke the awful moments of suspense which preceded the commencement of the fight (1).

So violent was the fire kept up by Wittgenstein's guns on the road by which the Emperor was to pass, that he was obliged to ards in leave his carriage, and creep along the ground on his hands and for my thin there was suddenly made his appearance at ten o clock at the Starcemin parace, in . I no small astonishment, of its royal immates, who were deliberating on the necessity of coming to terms with the enemy. After a short visit to the kings whom he reassured by the promise of the speedy arrival of his guards, hapoleon went out to visit the exterior works from the suburb of l'irna to that of I revberg, accompanied only by a single page to avoid attracting attention;

(1) I ala ve. 261, 263 St. Cvr. tv 22, 105, Olel

the approaching threaten, Schusperenberg imant the following never of the day to his groups nutry evelons on non-1 keretofore also has never on disconnected. All one offers so utesta passes are to be may up out I some but the merrabelm. tay done action of fitter buyens he orn I men that this great all once his been formed for mond. Rem a hard proposed a hot the constance and proposed tomala propie can de The year [513 will dennestrate what som be affected by the on ted force of st many powerful states. In a war sassered we ten quice more than ever to peace or those nistant by which one armies for we ja there been se det guished Besetton w tont loands to one wonth's and our sountry : may equin to a to be surrous as trueres de era na les and enertance on the feld of heltles mulerston and komes es tourple the west-seck are the entires of which you should with your for be had rest I further to the your a round it that he body most describe leaves of the astern the pe tecta safews sonory too se e g and action at prairies Be general to some, that and more to to referr and the sare of a mount. a remarks tern I are reaser and a lector are my I have se The Paregue or sale has del correct as some band ator to hing & from of motion dark and constructs and so close were the enemy's posts now in that quarter, that the youth was wounded by a spent musket-ball, while standing at the Emperor's side. Having completed this important reconnoissance, on which his operations for the day, in a great measure, depended, he returned to the palace, and sent out couriers in all directions to convey his orders to the corps which successively arrived for the defence of the capital. Meanwhile the guards and euirassiers, in great strength, followed the Emperor like a torrent across the bridges into the city; and it was soon apparent, from their number and gallant bearing, that all immediate danger was at an end. In vain the inhabitants offered them refreshments; these brave men, impressed to the lowest drummer with the urgency of the moment, continued to press on, though burning with thirst, and ready to drop down under the ardent rays of the sun. From ten in the morning till late at night, ceaseless columns of infantry, eavalry, and artillery, defiled without a moment's intermission over both the bridges; and while the enemy's columns darkened the brows of the heights of Raecknitz, the gallant euirassiers, in defiling over the bridges, keeping their eyes fixed on the spot, held their heads the higher, and passed on undaunted (1). At length, at four o'clock in the afternoon, Schwartzenberg's patience, which had long held out for the arrival of Klenau's corps, which had not yet come up; became exhausted, and he gave the signal for the attack. Instantly the batteries on all the heights round the eity were brought forward, and above a hundred guns in the front line commenced a terrible fire on its works and buildings. The bombs and eannon-balls fell on all sides, and over its whole extent; several houses speedily took fire; the inhabitants, in despair, took refuge in the cellars and vaults, to avoid the effects of the hombardment; while the frequent bursting of shells in the streets, the loud thunder of the artillery from the ramparts and redoubts, the heavy rolling of the guns and ammunition-waggons along the pavement, the eries of the drivers, and measured tread of the marching men who forced their way through the throng, combined to produce a scene of unexampled sublimity and terror (2). Every street and square in Dresden was by this time erowded with troops; above sixty thousand men had defiled over the bridges since ten o'elock, and the balls fell and bombs exploded with dreadful effect among their dense masses.

The attack of the Allies was indeed terrible. At the signal of three guns, fired from the headquarters on the heights of Raeeknitz, six eolumns, deep and massy, descended from the heights, each preeeded by fifty pieces of artillery, and advanced, with a steady step and in the finest order, against the eity. It was an awful, but yet an animating sight, when these immense masses, without firing a shot or breaking the regularity of their array, descended in silent majesty towards the walls. No force on earth seemed capable of resisting them; so vast, yet orderly was the array, that their tread, when hardly within cannon-shot, could be distinctly heard from the ramparts. Wittgenstein commanded the three columns on the right, who advanced from the Gross Garten; Kleist's Prussians in the eentre moved partly through the great garden, partly over the open ground to their left, under Prince Augustus of Prussia, and with them were combined three divisions of Austrians under Count Colloredo; the remainder of the Austriaus on the left, under Prince Maurice of Lichtenstein, formed the completion of the vast array. Soon the beautiful buildings of Dresden were enveloped in smoke and flame; an incessant fire issued from the works; while the allied batteries on the semiencele of heights around, sent a storm of projectiles through the air, and the moving batteries in front of their columns, steadily advanced lowards the embrasures of the redoubts (1).

⁽¹⁾ Odel. i. 249, 242, and ii. 164. Pain, ii. 264, 265. Lab. ii. 309, 310. (2) Lond, 112. Odel, i. 251, Tem. Ocul. ii. 166. Tain, ii. 268.

At some points the attack was irre-istable. The great redoubt situated in front of the Moesinsky garden, was carried in the most gallant style, after its palisades had been beat down by the Austrians under Colloredo Sir Robert Wilson, ever foremost where danger was to be encountered or glory won, was the first man who entered it. At the same time, an impetuous attack by the Bussians under Watteenstein, carried the redoubts ou the left, near the Honfgarten; while kleist, with his ordent Prussians, drove the enemy entirely out of the Gross Garten, and approached on that side close to the barriers of the suburb. The French, by bringing up fresh troops, regained the Moesifisky redoubt; but the fire of the Austrian batteries, which now enfiladed it on both sides, was so terrible, that the men who entered were almost all destroyed, and the work again fell into the enemy's hands, By six o'clock in the evening, the last reserves of St -Cyr's corps had been all engaged; the suburbs were furiously attacked, as well on the side of Parna as that of Plauen Napoléon, seriously ilisquieted, had stationed all the disposable battalions of the Old Guard at the threatened barriers, and was dispatching courier after courier to hasten the march of the Young a the Austrian guns were furiously battering the rampart, at the distance puly of a hundred paces, a tempest of bombs and cannon-balls was falling in the streets; the trembling inhabitants were wounded as soon as they appeared at their doors; frequent explosions of shells and ammunition-waggons in the streets, thinsed unly crsal consternation already the hatchets of the pioneers were heard at the gate of Planen and barrier of Dispodiswalde, and the triumphant ery was heard > tremendous -past six by self in sufiieient strength to hazard a sally at each extremity of his position. The grate of Plauen was thrown open, and the idense masses of the Guard under Ner rushed furiously out; while a quick discharge of musketry from the hopholed walls and windows of the adjacent houses, favoured their sortle. The Austrian columns, little anticipating so formidable an onset, full back in illiander; and points the assailants, wholly unprepared for such an attack, and deciming the day atready won, lost ground, the houng Guard, with found cheers, regained to bloode redoubt of Mordonks. It a lot, under Mordon, drose the Russians the Prussians from the tross for the Prussians from the tross for the first form.

... 11 1 . 1 1 1 ...

idal le squadrons from the gate of had by no means anticipated, and perceiving, from the strength of the columns which had issued from the cits, as well as the signit of the attacks that Napoleon in person directed the defence, the allied generals drew ca

fr took til til file file francische francis assembled in this position, having Dresden, bristling with cannon, as a vast fortress to support their centre—but their position was extraordinary, and, if defeated, altogether desperate, for they fought with their backs to the Eloc and their faces to the Rhine—the althed army, in great strength, had intercepted their whole communications with Trance, and if worsted, they were thrown back into a town with only two bridges traversing in otherwice impossible river in their roar (1).

Too hon of On the other hand, the Allies arranged their troops in the following manner -On the right. Witteenstein commanded the Bussians on the road to Pirna, and bleist the Prussians between Streisee and Strehlen in the centre. Schwartzenberg with the corps of Colloredo. Chastellar and Bianchi s grenadiers in reserve, occurred the semicircle of heights which extend from Strelden by Raccknitz to Plauen, while beyond Plauen, on the left, were posted the corns of Giulay and one division of Menau's troops, which had at length come up. But from the extreme allied left, at the foot of the heights of Wolfrutz to Priesmitz, was a vacant space wholly unoccupied, destined for the remainder of klenau's men when they should arrive, and the whole of that wing was not only entrusted to inexperienced troops, but was destitute of any solid support, either from meauthty of ground or villages-an oversight on the s the more reprehensible. ' Latour-Manbourg, fouras they stood teen thousan ening level place for the horse to charge over, white, it they had been grawn back half a mile, to the nasses and broken ground in their rear, or not pushed across the precipitous defile of Tharandt, which separated them from the main army, they would have been beyond the reach of danger (2)

Both armies passed a cheerless night, drenched to the skin hy the torrents of rain which never cersed to descend with uncommon violence Aapoleon, however, who had supped with the hing of Sixony the might before in the highest stirity was on horseback at six in the morning and rade out to the neighbourhood of the great redoubt, which had been the scene of such a designate contest the preceding day. Chastly traces of the combat were to be seen on all sules, out of the newly made graves han Is and arms were projecting, which stack up stark and stiff from the earth in the most frightful manner. The I mperor took his station I caule a great live which had been lighted by his troops in the include of the squares of the Old Guard, and immediately behind were the cavalry of the Guard in mounted beside their horses. The cannonade soon began along the whole line. Lut it was kept up for some hours only in a desultory manner, the excessive raid and thick must rendering it impossible either to move the infantry or point the guns with precision Joinini strongly urged the allied soreright during if e interval to change the front of their line, an Laccumulating their f ree on the enemy's left, which was next the lille, to cut off lan luming and l'ema towali who were at I man and Zittan, from the remain ler of the army This manmurre, which would have re-estal bel ed affairs was altogetl er forer in to Schwartzenberg's i leas which were entirely lased up n cutting off the I rench communications by their right with Torgan and Lele sie Meanwhile the French right gra lually gamed ground upon the detached corps of the trians beyond the rasine on it eathed left which was equally in apalle of maintaining itself by its futnisse steen, the [3], or el taining succe it actors the chasm from the centre; and Klenau, though strenuously urged to accelerate his movements, had not yet come up.

³⁷¹ SCEPT IT 111 113

Napoléon was not long of turning to the best account this state of matters in the allied line. Occupying himself a strong central position, and in a situation to strike atany portion of the vast semicircular line which lay before him, he had also this immense advantage, that the thick mist and incessant rain rendered it impossible, not only for the allied generals to see against what quarter preparations were directed, but even for the commanders of corps to perceive the enemy before they were close upon them. This last eireumstance led to a most serious catastrophe on the left. Unperceived by the enemy, Murat had stole round in the rear of Victor's men, and entirely turning the flank of the Austrians, got with Latour Maubourg's formidable euirassiers into the low meadows which lie between Wolfpitz and the Elbe, in the direction of Preistitz, where it was intended that Klenau's corps should have completed the allied line to the river. Shrouded by the mist, he had thus got with his whole force close to the extreme Austrian left, and almost perpendicular to their line, before they were aware of his approach. Murat, in order to divert the enemy's attention from this decisive attack, eaused Victor's infantry to occupy Lobda in their front, from whence they advanced in column against the line, and kept up a heavy cannonade from a strong battery posted on an eminence on their left; and, when the action had become warm with the foot, suddenly burst, with twelve thousand chosen horsemen, out of the mist, on their flank and rear. The effect of this onset, as of the Polish laneers, under similar circumstances, on the English infantry at Albuera, was decisive (1). In a few minutes the line was broken through, pierced in all directions, and cut to pieces. A few battalions next the centre made their way across the ravine, and escaped—the whole remainder, being three-fourths of the entire corps, with General Metsko. were killed or made prisoners.

No sooner was Napoleon made aware, by the advancing canno-Operations | nade on his right, that Murat's attack had proved successful, than he gave orders for his left to advance against Wittgenstein, while the action in the centre was still confined to a distant cannonade. Nev had concentrated the four divisions of the Young Guard between the Gross Garten and the Elbe, and with them and Kellermann's dragoous he immediately made a vigorous attack upon the enemy. He was received by the Russians with their wonted steadiness. The villages of Seidnitz and Gross Dobritz were gallantly defended, against an overwhelming superiority of force, by General de Roth; and when he could no longer make them good, he retreated in good order to the main body of Wittgenstein's men, placed in the rear behind Rieck. Jomini seeing Ney far advanced along the Elbe, and showing his flank to the allied centre, connselled the Emperor Alexander to move forward kleist, Milaradowitch, Colloredo, and the masses of the centre which had not yet been engaged, and assail his columns in flank, by Strehlen: a movement which promised the most important results, and would probably have balanced the success of Murat on the left. Alexander at once appreciated the importance of this movement, and Kleist and Milaradowitch were already in motion to execute it; but to support them, and fill up the chasm in the line occasioned by their descending the hills to the right, it was necessary that Barclay de Tolly, with the Russian reserve (2), should advance to the front. Barelay, however, did not move: the signal mode for that purpose, was at first not seen from the mist, and sub-equently disregarded, and before the order could be renewed by an officer, a dreadful catastrophe had occurred, which in a great measure determined the Allies to retreat.

Moreau, who had with equal energy and ability discharged the important duties devolved upon him in the council of the Albeever since the campaign reonened, was in earnest conversation with the I mperor Alexander about this very advance of Barelay's, when a cannon-shot from the French batteries in the centre almost carried off both his less, the hall passing through the hody of his horse. This melanchely event excited a very deep sensation at the alked headquarters, and for a time averted Alexander's attention at the most critical moment of the action. The interest which it awakened was enhanced by the extraordinary heroism which the wounded general crinced under an execss of pain which might well have shaken any man's fortitude. He never attered a groan while carried to the rear, with his manufed limbs hanging by the skin; and when laid on the table of the cottage into which he was carried to suffer amoutation, he called for a eigar, which he smoked with the utmost tranquillity life hore the namfol operation with the same firmness which had distinguished his whole demeanour since his wound and when the surgeon who had cut off the right lee examined the other, and pronounced, with a faltering voice, that it was impossible to saveit-"Cut it off then, also," said he calmly, which was immethately done. When the retrest commenced, he was transported in a litter to Laun, where he wrote a letter to his wife singularly characteristic of his storism as he had lived, but without giving the slightest trace of religious limpression. His body was embalaned and conveyed to Prague, whence it was transported to St. Petersborg, and buried in the Catholic church of that capital with the same homours as had been paid to the remains of Knitsoff. Alex-and anidet the enemies of the people whom he had conducted with so much glory (4)

The manner in which this great general met his death wound, was very remarkable. The capnon of the Guard, which were posted in front of the post-

I whe present the little of freeden if ree day rays. This both my I genered of they a number of That proof Despress to always for hats. They have performed to a caputation as well as pure of the Despress to the same of the period of the proof of the proof of the period of the perio

spen ale. Though the sen e has paste a seen

President has do not limbrance. Be harded as held of a both power with greated as a case of library and the greated as a case of library held of the second as a case of library held of the second as a case of library held of library held reduceres the country power to rube data here. It exceed a private whom for support and according to a ruse of divide to a private value of the private value value of the private value value of the private value valu tion which Napoléon occupied, had been observed for some time manner in to exhibit an unusual degree of languor in replying to the dis-Much be charges of the enemy; and the Emperor sent Gourgaud forward to inquire into the cause of so unusual a circumstance. The answer returned was, that it was to no purpose to waste their fire, as they could not reply with effect to the enemy's batteries, placed on the heights above, from so low a situation. " No matter," said the Emperor, " we must draw the attention of the enemy to that side; renew firing." Immediately they began their discharge, and directed their shot to a group of horsemen which at that moment appeared on the brow of the hill on the heights above. An extraordinary movement in the circle soon showed that some person of distinction had fallen; and Napoléon, who was strongly inclined to superstition, at first supposed it was Schwartzenberg, and observed on the sinister augury which the conflagration in his palace on the night of the fête on Marie Louise's marriage had afforded (1). It was then, however, that Moreau was struck; and so auxious had the Emperor been to conceal the intelligence of that great commander's arrival from his troops, though well aware of it himself, that it was not till next day that it became known; when the advanced guards, in pursuing the Allies towards Bohemia, coming upon a little spaniel which was piteonsly moaning, were attracted by the collar round its neck, on which were written the words-" I helong to General Moreau." Thus they became at once acquainted with his presence and his fate (2).

I land 44% 121 Eaple a 1941 Till 6 13 Ear are in 64 ft The year white theories was a rich behaviord by a singua minimum of educin trees) and once

A council of war was now held at the allied headquarters as to the course which should be pursued; the Emperor Alexander, King of the Allus, when it is Prussia, and principal generals, assembled on horseback in a ploughresolved to ed field, to deliberate on a step on which the destiny of Europe might depend. The King of Prussia was clear for continuing the action, and to this opinion the Emperor of Russia and his principle generals inclined; observing that the whole centre and reserves had not yet engaged; that the French would hardly venture to attack their centre, when defended by so powerful an artillery; and that a decisive blow might yet be struck at the French left. But Schwartzenberg was decidedly for a retreat. Independent of the disaster on his left, which he felt the more sensibly as it had fallen almost exclusively on the Austrian troops, he was not without anxiety for his right, on account of the progress of Vandamme in his rear in that direction, who had advanced to Koenigstein, and already made himself master of the defile of Pirna. He strongly represented that the reserve parks of the army had not been able to get up; that the prodigious consumption of the two preceding days had nearly exhausted their ammunition, several guns having only a few rounds left; that the magazines of the army had not been able to follow its advance; in fine, that it was indispensable to regain Bohemia to prevent the dissolution of the army. These reasons, urged with the anthority of the commander-inchief, and supported by such facts, proved decisive, and a retreat was agreed to against the strenuous advice of the King of Prussia, who foresaw to what risk it would expose the allied cause, and in an especial manner his own dominions. But it is evident that they were mere covers, put forward to conceal the sense of a defeat : no victorious army ever yet was stopped in its career by want of amminition, and somehow or other the successful party hardly ever fails to find food (5).

⁽⁴⁾ den, 40, 505. (2) Francis 2 1, 2) 2, Copelly, 232, 233, (3) Jem. Iv. 165, Tert, 34, 34, Bend, 1.0, 121, 13 o pression research of Morrels or indical

depth, and the council of war which arcembled to determine on the correct, is entirely confirmed, and in part then from the continent made to rice by my saverable feleral hard Cathernt, who was with Estraord But although retreat was thus resolved on before dark on the call to be to 27th, it was by no means equally clear how it was to be effected the lard Vandamme was master of the road by Pirna; that by Freyberg had been cut off by the successes of the hing of Apples. Thus the two great roads. those by which the army had traversed the mountains, were in the enemy's hands, and the intermediate range between them was crossed only by country or inferior roads, which, amidst the torrents of rain which were falling, and the innumerable chariots and guns which would have to roll over them. would soon be rendered almost impassable. There was every reason to fear that the albed columns, defiling with these numerous encumbrances in the narrow gorges, traversed by these broken up roads, would fall into inextricable confusion, and at the very least lose a large part of their artillery and baggage Schwartzenberg, however, deemed the risk of a prolonged stay in presence of the enemy, after the disasters of his left, more than sufficient to counterbalance these dangers, and therefore, though klenau came un ou the night of the 27th, the retreat was persisted in the following day. The army was ordered to march in three columns, the first under Barclay de

walde (1)

Early on the morning of the 28th, Napoléon, after his usual Appearance of the fuld custom, visited the field of battle. It may be conceived what a ghastly speciacle was presented by the ground, on which, within the space of a league round the walls, three hundred thousand men had combated for two days with determined resolution, under the fire of above a thousand pieces of emuon. The wounded had, for the most part, been transported during the night into the town hy the efforts of the French surgeous and the unwerried zerl of the Inhabitants, who on this occasion, as after the battle of Bautzen, exhibited in its full lustre the native benevolence of the Saxon character. But the dead still unburied lay accumulated in frightful heaps, for the most part half naked, having been stripped by those hends in woman's form, whom so productous a concourse of men had attracted in extraordinary numbers to the scene of wor. They lay I fled above each other in vast masses around and within the Moransky redoubt, before the Doppodismalde and Planen barriers, near folds, and in the environs of the Grust Garten. The profound excitement which the war had produced throughout the circlized world, was there manifest, for the corpses of the slain exhibited all nations and varieties of men, both of Asia and I prope the blue-exed Goth lay beneath the swarthy Italian, the long-haired Bussian was still locked in his death struggle with the un faunted frank, the fiery than lay athwart the stout Norman, the lightsome Cossark and roving Tartar reposed far from the banks of the bon or the ster pes of samarcand. Currasses, muskets, sal res, helmets, belts, an I cartouche-boxes lay about in endless disorder, which the Inhalitants, simulated by the love of gain, were collective, with the sast numbers of cannon-balls which had sunk into the earth, for the I reach artillery and stores (2

the discount thresularthember than a of the first think the first think the second because the think the action and another the second the second think the sec

Napoléon was far from being insensible to the magnitude of the Nanollon sets out in wreck, and gave orders that the principal Saxon sufferers by the siege should be indemnified as far as possible; and then rode on to the height where Moreau had been struck, and caused the distance to the battery from whence the shot issued to be measured, which proved to be two thousand yards. The vast array of the Allies was already out of sight; a few horsemen alone observed the approach of the French, who were actively engaged in the pursuit. Seeing he could not overtake them, the Emperor turned aside and rode to Pirna, where he enquired minutely into what had passed there during the two preceding eventful days. The Prince of Wirtemberg, he learned, had that morning been engaged with Vandanime's corps, and was retiring in good order towards Toplitz, closely pursued by that general: Murat, with his horse, was following on the traces of the left wing, on the road of Freyberg; and Marmont and St.-Cyr's columns were pursuing the centre on the intermediate roads. After sitting still an hour, he said, in the highest spirits, "Well, I think I have seen it all: make the Old Guard return to Dresden; the Young Guard will remain here in bivouac;" and, entering his carriage, returned to the capital (1).

The battle of Dresden is one of the most remarkable victories ever by Napole- gained by Napoléon; and if it were memorable for no other reason, it will never be forgotten for this—it was the last pitched battle he ever gained. The advance to Pirna seemed the fatal limit of his prosperous fortune: from the moment that he then relinquished the pursuit, he became involved in calamity; and disaster succeeded disaster, till he was precipitated from the throne. Yet was this great battle a truly glorious achievment, worthy to be placed beside the brightest of his earlier career, and such as well might cast a long ray of light over the dark vista of misfortune by which it was succeeded. Anticipated by the Allies in their masterly march upon Dresden, wellnigh deprived of that vital stronghold by his never conceiving they would have the courage to attack it, he contrived, by extraordinary efforts, not only to arrive in time for its deliverance, but to discomfit the Allies by a signal defeat under its walls. This battle is the only one in his whole career in which Napoleon operated at once by both flanks, without advancing his centre; and the reason of his selecting this singular, and, in ordinary circumstances, perilous mode of attack, was not merely that his position in front of the intrenched camp enabled him to do so without risk, while the great strength of the allied centre forbade an attack on them in that quarter; but that by gaining, by success at these two extremities, command of the roads of Freyberg and Pirna, he threw the Allies back, for their retreat to Bohemia, upon the intermediate inferior lines of communication across the mountains, where there was reason to hope that a vigorous pursuit would make them lose great part of their artillery and baggage (2).

The fruits of this victory were as great as its conception had been felicitous. Thirteen thousand prisoners, almost all Austrians, were taken. Six-and-twenty cannons, eighteen standards, and a hundred and thirty caissons, fell into the hands of the enemy. Including the killed, wounded, and missing, on the two days, the allied loss was not short of twenty-five thousand men, while the French were not weakened by more than half the number. But these results, important and dazzling as they were, especially in re-establishing the prestige of the Emperor's invincibility, were but a part of the convequences of the discomfiture at Dresden. Barelythad been ordered to take the road, by Dohna Clesholtel, to Petershalde; but the Russian officer who delivered the order, said Altenberg by mistake, misted of Petershalde. Barelay understood him so: the convequence of which was, that Kleist alone, with the Prussians, was left to follow the great road by Pirno; and the Russians were thrown on the road by Dippodishalde and Altenberg, already encumbered with the producious accumulation of fustrain carriages. The high way was speedily cut through—the confusion of artillery and carriages of all sorts became enextricable. Cannon and bagsagewaggons were abaudoned at every step, and the disorder soon became extreme. Different corps of different nations got intermingled in the crowded defiles orders were given in a language which one half who heard them did enemy's hands; and before the troops had extricated themselves from the mountains, two thousand additional prisoners had been taken. The poet horner, who had recovered of the wound he had so perfidiously received at the commencement of the armistice, received a ball in his breast, and died in tho action a few hours before it began, he had composed his immortal lines to his sword, the testament of his genius to his avenging countrymen. But the most sensible loss which the Alhes sustained during the retreat, was that of General Moreau, whose great talents were never more required than at that period, to arrest the exits which then menaced the very existence of the coalition. But Providence had decreed that the cruse of virtue and justice should trainiphly its own mative strength, and owe nothing even in their most exalted or blameless form to the forces of the Revolution (4).

this occasion, they would have failed in producing the results commander which took place, if he had not been seconded to a wish by the imbecality displayed in the execution of the attack upon Dresden The original concention of that design was in the highest degree felicitous. and by succeeding in placing themselves in overwhelming strength before that capital, and on the direct line of the enemy's communications on the 25th, when Nanoleon and his guards were still a full day's march off, they had completely out-generaled that vigilant commander, and brought lum, beyond all question, to the very brink of destruction, Had they commenced the assault that afternoon, success was certain, for they were already six to one - St -Cyr and his corns would have been beaten, and the whole defensive system of Napoleon on the 1 the broken through and destroyed. I yen when, by delaying the attack till next day, they had given time for Napoléon bimself to come up, they might still, by commencing the assault early on the forenoon of the 26th, before the bulk of his guards had arrived, have carried the place, rith the ad litional fustre of living done so when the I mperor in person was in command. By delaying the attack till four in the afternoon, they garred nothing, for klenan even then had not come up and they had merely given time for Napol on to bring up sixty thousand additional form for the defence. It was timposed by to expect to earry a forthed place, extraoned by eighty thousand men, by a coap demans the stroke was now tool late, and should not have been delivered. The dispositions next day were consulty faulty; for Schwattzenberg, contrary to all advice, invisted on extending his left over the open ground beyond Planen, without any support, against Murat's cavalry, to which, in consequence, it fell an easy prey; while by throwing it back, up the side of the ravine of Thorandt, it would have been altogether secure on the top of its precipitous banks from attack; and he placed inexperienced infantry there, without horse to cover them, when thirty thousand noble cavalry were massed together in useless strength behind the centre, which was already so strong from its position on the heights, and the prodigious array of artillery by which it was defended, as to be beyond the reach of danger.

In justice to Schwartzenberg, however, it must be observed, that stons at the these glaring errors are not to be wholly userihed to him. It is no easy matter, as he himself said, to command an army, when emperors and kings are with its general. Such were the dissensions which at this period prevailed at the allied headquarters, that nothing but the most exalted spirit in the bosoms of the sovereigns who ruled its destinies, and the most indefatigable efforts on the part of the able diplomatics who were entrusted with its counsels, prevented the alliance from being broken up within a few days after it began the great contest for the deliverance of Europe. Hardenherg, Metternich, D'Anstett, Lord Aberdeen, and Sir Charles Stewart, labonred assidnously, and not without effect, to reconcile the conflicting jealousies and interests, but it was a herculean task; and nothing but an universal sense of the common danger which they all incurred, could have prevented a righture taking place. They experienced the truth of the words of Tacitus: "prospera omnes sibi vindicant, adversa uni solo imputantur." No one would acknowledge responsibility for the advance against Dresden after it failed: to hear the opinions of the military conneil, you would imagine it had been forced on the army against the universal opinion of its leaders. The Russians loudly exclaimed against the Austrians as the anthors of all the calamities, and referred not without secret satisfaction to the magnitude of the losses which they, and they alone, had sustained; the Austrians replied, that if Barelay had obeyed Schwartzenberg's order to advance on the forenoon of the 27th, all would yet have been repaired. The Prussians lamented a retrograde movement which would, to all appearance, deliver up Berlin to the cruel exactions of the enemy, and paralyse the rising spirit of Germany by the exhibition of its northern capital in chains. Conferences, political as well as military, were frequent during the retreat; the troops of the different nations would take no orders but from their own generals: it was hard to say who really governed the army, or whether it had any direction at all. Schwartzenherg deemed it advisable, situated as he was, to avoid any general action, and remain wholly on the defensive; and it was apparent to all, that if Napoléon persevered in making propositions, there was great probability they would be listened to. Such was the untoward aspect of affairs at the allied headquarters, when the face of events was entirely changed, unanimity and concord restored to the combined chiefs, and confidence and mutual esteem to their followers, hy a series of events in the exterior circle of the conflict, so marvellous that they defeated all human calculation, and converted the recriminations of misfortune into the song of triumph, over the whole allied states (4).

Movements of Yanof Yandamme against Ostermann,

On the very day on which Napoléon gained his decisive success before Dresden, Vandamme, following up his instructions, to throw himself upon the rear of the allied army and await the issue of exents before that city, had crossed the Elbe at Koeniestein, and been ongood with Ostermann, who had been left to watch him with the division of the old Bussian guards and the Bussian division of Prince Fugune of Wirtams here. The French general advanced towards Pirna, in order to intercent the bag of the enemy's retreat, and the disproportion of force cave him good reason to hope that he would be able to do so, for he had twenty-seven thousand infantry, three thousand cavalry, and eighty meees of cannon (1). whereas the Bussian had only seventeen thousand at his disnosal Oslermann in the first instance fell back also towards Pirna, but on the day following, being that on which Nanoleon halted his guard at that place, he was obliged, by the retreat of the Albes and its occupation by the French. to change the direction of his retreat, and fall back towards Petersvalde Vandamme had not before him on the high-road to that place, and the Russians had to light their way through the enemy's ranks at Giesbubel and Nollendorf Ostermanu's grenadiers, however, made their was after a sharu encounter, and he reached Peterswalde, where he collected his forces, and prepared to oppose a stout resistance to Vandamme, who, having failed in barring the way to his columns, was now preparing to follow closely profit lus footsteps, and press him vigorously with all his forces (2)

A great assue now depended on the efforts of these intropid gedepend of nervis, nothing less than the ruin of the allied arms, or the destruction of the corns which had so fearlessly descended hiln its rear. was at "take. All the roads from Saxony in that direction through the Przgehirge range, terminate upou Torphtz, in the boliculan plalu If, therefore. Vandamme could make himself master of that point of intersection, he would be he a situation to prevent the allies debouching from the mountains. while the king of Varies on the one road, Marmont and St -Cyr In the eentre, and Appoleon with the guards on the left pass, pressed the rear of their columns, and thus exposed them to almost certain ruin when enfaueled with several thousand carriages in those parrow debles and inhospitable ridges On the other hand. If the French were defeated, they can a still greater risk of being destroyed by the retiring masses of the grand albed army, who would fight with the energy of despair to re-open their communication with if c Bohentlan plains. Thus, both parties had equal motives for exertion, both saw clearly the vital unpertance of the contest, and the meanest sol her in the ranks was as strongly impressed with it as their chiefs. Vandamme now recollected the Imperors words, that to him would be given to receive the sword of the conquered, and that row was the time to win his marshalls baton. Ostermann was penetrated with the consistion, that on his efforts and those of the I rave guards, would depend the safety of their believed I mperor and both were brinly resolved to conquer or die on the ground where ther stood 50 Z. 401 Van land ie, sensible of the value of time in the critical operation 14 0 041 Fruit In which had been entrusted to ldm, and an are that the Your & Guar ! was at Pirna, to give him the support which Sapol'ser had give mised has if reputed excerts descended on the morra g of the Bul from the mountains and af proached the Unestine, al o feel taken post to a good position in the plant between Law and Tarplate, hitle more than registratities to one in given high test (1) in the fight of the problem of the p

half a league in advance of the latter town. Ostermann's forces, however, were now much reduced; from the losses and detachments of the preceding days, he could not collect above fourteen thousand men to defend his posts, and the French had at least double the number. Already the near approach of the enemy had spread the most violent alarm among its inhabitants, and the whole corps diplomatique in particular had taken to flight, and were already far advanced on the road to Dutch and Lahn; and the King of Prussia, who was there, and remained at his post, alone succeeded by his coolness in preserving some degree of order in the rear of the combatants. The French general, conceiving he had only to deal with the broken and dejected remains of the army beaten at Dresden, at first brought forward his troops as they successively came up into action, and hurried with only nine battalions to assault the Russian left wing. This rash attempt was speedily repulsed; but the arrival of the division of Mouton Duvernet restored the combat in that quarter, and the Russians in their turn were compelled to give way. An obstinate action with various success now took place over the whole line: the villages of Straden and Priesten were successively carried by the division Philippon, which had just come up; but the latter village was shortly after retaken, and after being three times lost and won at the point of the bayonet, finally remained in the hands of the Russians. The weight of the French attack, however, was directed against the Russian left, where the line stood in the open plain; and Ostermann, seeing this, brought up three regiments of the Russian guards to the menaced point—the Bonnet d'or, Preobazinsky, and Simonofsky grenadiers; and the heroic resistance of these incomparable troops, the flower and pride of the Russian army, opposed a wall of steel to the French, which all the efforts of the assailants were unable to pass. In vain the French batteries were advanced to within pistol-shot, and sent a storm of grape through the Russian lines; in vain company after company was swept away by the terrific discharges of their musketry; these heroic troops stood firm, constantly closing to the centre as their ranks were thinned. They found there the Russian Thermopylæ, and the greater part of them perished where they stood; but, like the three hundred Spartans under Leonidas, they changed the fate of the world by their blood. A strong French column in the evening advanced against Priesten, carried it by assault, and moved on to attack the grand Russian battery in the centre; but the heroism of the guards had gained the requisite time. General Diebitch and the Grand Duke Constantine, at this moment arrived with the cavalry and some grenadiers of the Russian guard, with which this menacing column was stopped; and Vandamme, seeing that the Russians were now receiving considerable reinforcements, drew off for the night to the ground he occupied before the action (1).

Vandamme remains firm superiority of force which he had the first day was now turned the other way; and the increasing force of the enemy, who were now issuing at all the passes from the mountains, threatened, not only to expose him to ruinous odds, but even might entirely overwhelm his corps. He had been promised support, however, by Napoléon, and distinctly ordered to advance to Tæplitz; the Young Guard, eight-and-twenty thousand strong, was only a few hours' march in the rear; and he never for a moment conceived it possible, that, having assigned to him the onerous duty of cutting off the retreat of the right wing of the allied army, that great commander would leave him unsupported in the perilous attempt(1). The marshal's baton danced before his eyes : justances were frequent, in the earlier history of the revolutionary wars, of a similar act of daring being attended with the most glorious results, in war, as in love, he who nothing ventures will nothing win. Influenced by these considerations, to which the native re-olution of his character gave additional weight, he resolved to maintain his ground, and disposing his corps, now reduced by the losses of the preceding days to twentythree thousand men, in the best order, he awaited the approach of the Allies in the neighbourhood of Culm (9).

The hourly mercasing numbers of the enemy, now gave them an Business to Opportunity, of which they skilfully availed themselves, of crushing the audacious invader who had thus broken into their rear, in the hope of receiving the sword of the conquered. Their dispositions were speedily made. Vandamme had taken post on the heights in front of Culm. . .. f 1 of the me unto ne alus lookeng towards 5 centre crossing t1 . . . as the hamlet of . - und afforded no natural advantages, and the much generals therefore resolved to overwhelm it with superior force, and drive both it and the centre up against the mountains, where escape, at least for the artiflers and carriages, would be impossible. With this view, Barclay de Tolly, who had now assumed the command, as well from his rank as the wound of Ostermanu, who had lost an arm on the preceding day, directed the Russians under Raeff-kor to - Ir ne of the seron

Russian light and heavy horse stretched across the chaussee, with a powerful artillery, and united the right and left wings. The total force thus brought to bear against vandamme, was little short of sixty thousand men, of whom ten thousand were admirable horse (5)

The battle began by a sugorous charge of the Bussian borse on the flank of the French left in the plain, which being outflanked, and turned at the same time that Colloredo's corps advanced against its front, has speedly thrown into confusion, and driven up against the centre. In front of Culm Steedily the Austrians moved directly towards that town, while the I reach left, non entirely broken, and pushed on by the cavalry in flank, not dispersed over the plain like chalf before the wind. Vandamme, now seriously alarmed, dispatched a fresh brigade to stop the progress of the enemy on the left, but they, too, were overwhelmed in the confusion, and the allied horse sweeping round their rear, had already approached the village of Arbesau, not far distant from the great road to Pirna At the same time, a sharp conflict was going on on the right, and the Bussians were gradually gainly ground on their adversaries posted on the slopes of the mountains. Matters were in this critical state when a foud fire of musketry, followed by sestral explosions, was heard on the summit of the pass, Liwards Nellen! efdirectly in the rear of the I reach column, and on the only line by which they could escape for at first illuminated every countenance in il e I cench ranks, for 10 one doubted that it was the Young burnd pushed on five

^[12] and man personal marca high califor 201. a sint act unite four Eartier to part on to Taples to was breath to hand be a Count of the trans atet magnermaleuren, le tat Gree

^[2] Paten fe 315 Jone je 400 351, 41-27 m fo £27 £7# (3) 3-mt 43 land b.c 427, fab. & be-

Pirna to their support, which would speedily re-establish the fortunes of the day; but this satisfaction was of short duration, and was converted into corresponding eousternation when the Prussian standards were seen on the summits; and the news circulated through the ranks, that it was Kleist with eighteen thousand Prussians who thus lay directly on their only line of 1etreat. In effect, the Prussian general, who had been directed to retreat by Schoenwald and Nollendorf, and had the evening before received orders from Alexander to descend upon the right flank of the French, towards Kraupen, finding the road which he followed insupportably bad, had made his way across to the great chaussée, and had just seized and blown up some French eaissons at the top of the pass (1).

And now a seene ensued, unparalleled even in the varied annals of the revolutionary war. Vandamme, seeing his danger, drew off the trench his troops from the heights on the right in front of Culm, and rallying as well as he could the broken remains of his left, formed his whole force into a column, the cavalry in front under Corbineau, the artillery in the centre, and the infantry on the flank. Ilaving made these dispositions. which were the best which eireumstances would admit, he began his retreat and got through Culm in safety; but in the little plain beyond, extending to the foot of the gorge of Tilnitz, the Russian and Austrian horse precipitated themselves on all sides upon the retreating mass, while a formidable array of artillery, by incessant discharges, threw its rear into confusion. Disorder was already spreading rapidly in the ranks, and Vandamme had resolved to sacrifice his guns to save his men, when, to complete their misfortunes, the advanced guard reported that the defile which they must immediately ascend was occupied in strength by the Prussian eorps! Despair immediately seized the troops; all order and command was lost; Corbineau, at the head of the horse, dashed up the pass with such vigour, that though the ascent was so steep that in ordinary circumstances they could hardly have ascended at the gentlest trot, he pushed right through the Prussian column, cut down their gunners, and seized their artillery, which, however, he could not earry away, and got clear off (2).

The Prussians now imagined that they were themselves cut off, struggle in and at the point of ruin; and their whole infantry, breaking their the defile ranks, rushed like a foaming torrent headlong down the defile, to force their way through the barrier which seemed to oppose their retreat at its foot. In the middle of the gorge they met the French column, in similar disorder and impelled by the same apprehensions, which was struggling for life and death, with the Russians thundering in their rear, to get up! A seene of indescribable horror ensued: close pent in a steep and narrow pass, between overhanging scaurs and rocks, nearly thirty thousand men on the two sides, animated with the most vehement passions, alike brave and desperate, contended elbow against elbow, knee against knee, breast against breast, mutually to force their way through each other's throng. In the confusion Kleist was seized by the French, but speedily delivered; Vandamme, however, was made prisoner by the Prussians. The remainder of his corps, who were squeezed through or out of the defile, immediately dispersed through the neighbouring woods and wilds, and, throwing away their arms, made the best of their way over the mountains to Peterswalde, where they were received and re-armed by St.-Cyr's eorps (5). Nearly twelve thousand men, ⁽¹⁾ Krausler, 658. Jom. iv. 401, 402. Bout. 43. 1 am, n. 316, 317. St.-Cyr, iv, 129.

⁽²⁾ Jon., iv. 402. Bout. 44 Fain, in. 319. Vaud. i. 161. Sir R. Witson, 44, note.
(3) "Generals Philippon and Duvernet are oc-

HISTORY OF EUROPE. meliding Corbineau's cavalry, escaped in this manner, though in woful plight, and totally ruined as a military force, but the whole remainder of the corps, including both Vandamme's and Hano's men, were either killed or made prisoners. The latter amounted to seven thousand; and sixty pieces of cannon, two eagles, and three hundred ammunition-waggons were taken. The total loss of the French in the two days was not less than eighteen thousand men, while that of the Allies in the same period did not exceed five thousand (1) Napoleon On the morning of the 50th, thus fraught with disaster to Napoleon, he was with great complacency surveying the different positions of his corns on the map, and anticipating the brilliant accounts he was so soon to receive of the operations of Vandamme in year of the enemy " It this moment " said he to Bertluer, " Marmont and St -Cyr must have driven the Austrian represented on Torolitz, they will there receive the last ransom of the enemy We cannot be long of hearing news of Vandamme: and no shall then know what advantages he has been able to derive from his fine position. It is he hum that we shall finish in that quarter. We will leave some corps of observation, and recall the rest to headquarters. I calculate that, after the disasters experienced at Dresden, it will take at least three weeks for the army of Schwartzenberg to re-organize liself, and again take the field. It will not require so much time to execute my projected move-reality of his yictory, and again spread the terror of his arms through the whole north of Germany (2) Maneria. In the afternoon of the same day, the most alarming news began with the to spread from the side of Pirna It was rumoured that a great the section settle had been sustained beyond the mountains; it was even said quent arrival of breathless and disordered horsemen confirmed the dismal intelligence, and at length Corbineau himself, wounded and covered with blood, made his way to the Imperor, still armed with the Prussian sabre which in the melée, he had exchanged for his own from him hapolion heard authentic details of the extent of the calamity; and he learned with grief, that not only the grand allied army was saved, but that it would lear back to Prague the trophies of a victory. Napole on received the details of the disaster coldly, and said-" To a flying emmy you must either open a bridge of gold or oppose a barrier of steel Vandamme, et appears, could not oppose that barrier of steel " Then, turning to l'arthier, he said. "Lan we have written any thing which could have insured him with the fatal bley of des-count in religing what was a of the servegor the counter they that exceed 18 cor because first heart fine, we would put three rt a terjer Lie stes en (fibre sate sale succeed a tec set at the cibet a -be Cra te biate to 31 f f gad ibil Casale 212

⁽¹⁾ States to Forther day 21 (3) 5 % Cyr 12 222 Four 41 to June to 10 413 Tao 315 224 5 cf W con 43

To be les [to 1 souper mater and ber 1 la] and at a ? and mounted in the fam after all tart where and mended in the fam alter. In tall above another at pung lets the lost of deal are not some men extrict before. The great has not to sed be sented a before the next to age "to a lost of active made more seconds on regard as a density prout, when they were not briles of the on rous were ty of the or no, and gel tries of the e per lease. The set on describe he have ex mind as the most of reperste and glurious expects cambed as the meast deposite and glorious engages went of any holy all the liter as no it is usualised. I would not the not the war and is to be plosed boshle the herouse of the Ey hard town where not of I find Eng along E the I was a local throat the abouter & houses that would be faithed by Ch. have the so commend for he set pe or softer for it have to the horizon when the soft soft market are entirely by more a fact the gament of the proper to been a ded to there judgment an eint to 6 of the omepace to here was fore yet by a case a we " whe loss we come a 126-126 for a some time to a 1 and day that what here A 100, to 112 111 cending into the plain of Bohemia? Fain, look over the order-hook." Nothing, however, it is said, was discovered to warrant the descent from Peterswahle. "Well," said he to Maret. "this is war. High in the morning-low enough at night. From a triumph to a fall, is often but a step." Then, takingthe comnasses in his hand, he mused long on the man, reneating unconsciously the lines of Corneille (1),-

> " J'ai servi, commandé, vaincu, quarante aunées; Du monde entre mes mains j'ai vu les destinées, El l'ai toulours comm qu'en chaque événement Le destin des ctats depend d'un seul moment."

But, in truth, without disputing the incalculable influence of a Retrotione enthe real few hours, or even minutes, on the fate of nations during war, causerof nothing is more certain than that, in this instance, the misfortunes Van-ב' יווורים of Napoléon were owing to himself; and that the attempt which he made, according to his usual custom, to throw the blame upon others, was as unjust as it was ungenerous. He maintained stoutly in writing, as well as speaking, thinking that Vandamme was killed, that he had given him positive orders to intrench himself on the summit of the mountains, and not descend into the gulf at their feet (2); and yet, only two days before, Berthier, by his orders, had enjoined him "to march directly upon Toplitz (5); and on the very day on which the disaster occurred, (50th August,) Berthier had written to St.-Cyr, informing him of Vandamme's success on the first day against Ostermann, from which he anticipated the most glorious results (1). In fact, Napoleon himself admitted, in conversation to St.-Cyr, that he should have moved forward the Young Guard from Pirna to support Vandamme (5); in which case not only would no disaster at all have been incurred, but the movement on Taulitz, which was ably conceived, would have led to the destruction of Kleist's corps, and the disorganization of the whole right wing of the allied army. Decisive success was within his grasp, when he amitted to seize it, and permitted the advantage to pass over to the enemy, by retaining his young guard inactive at Pirna during the two most vital days of the campaign (6).

His panegyrists endeavour to account for this neglect by observall attempts ing, that he was seized with vomiting at Pirna, and obliged to return to Dresden in great pain on the afternoon of the 28th; but, admitting this to have been true, it was no reason why he should not have advanced Mortier with the young guard, to support a corps charged with so perilous and momentous a mission as that of stopping the retreat of

(t) Fain, ii. 320, 321.
(2) "That unhappy Vandamme, who seems to have been killed, had not left a single sential on the mountains, nor any reserve in any quarter: he engolfed bimself in a hollow, without feeling his way in any manner. If he had only left four battalions and four pieces of cannon on the heights in reserve, that disaster would not have occurred. 1 had given him positive orders to intrenel himself on the heights, and encamp his corps there, and send down into Bohemia nothing but parties to disquirt the enemy, and obtain mass."—Narotrus to Sr.-

Corn, 1st September 1813. St.-Corn, iv. 392.

(3) "March direct to Taplitz; jou nill conceryour-self with glory."—Beatmen to Vandamn, 29th August 1813.—"Three or four hours only were required to retreat to Nullemlorf, where he would have been in an impregnable position; but Van-damme conecived he was not at liberty, after this pssitive order, to effect that movement. What would he have said to Napoteon if, on his retreat, he had met him at Nollendorf, as he had been led to expect would be the case, and the enemy meanwhile, resunning his ground at Gulm, had secured the retreat of the grand army?"-I ictites et Con-queter, axii. 5 Note.

(4) *1 loans received your letter of the 6th, from Reinhard Grimme, in which you describe your position behind the 6th corps (Marmout.). The intention of his Majesty is, that you support the 6th corps; but it is desirable that you should select for that purpose a road to the left between the Duke of Bagusa and the corps of General Fundarime, who has obtained great success over the enemy, and made 2,000 prisoners.—But then to Sr.-Car. 30th August 1813. Sr.-Can. iv. 389. (5) "The Emperor admitted to me, in conversation on the 7th September, that if he had not halted his guard at Pirna on the 28th, but, on the contrary, followed it up on the traces of Vandamme, he would have found a great opportunity of striking a blow in the neighbourhood of Taplitz."-Sr.-

Crn, iv. 137, 138. 4 (6) Fain, ii. 298.

a hundred thousand men. No man knew better than he did what risk is infor they required only a few hours to march from Pirna to Peterswalde (1). The truth was, that Vandamme neither disobeyed orders, nor was forgot; he acted strictly according to his instructions, and was fully present to the Emperor's mind, watched his march with the utimost anxiety. But Napokeon judged of present events by the past. He conceived that the apparation of thirty thousand men in their rear, immediately after a severe defeat in front, would paralyze and discomfit the Allies as completely as it had done in the days of Rivoli and Ulm; and he was unwilling to engage the young guard in the mountains, as it might erelong be required for his own projected march upon Berlin. He forgot that his conscripts were not the soldiers of Austerlitz and Jena; that the Russian guards were not the Austrians of 1736; and that Ostermann was neither Alvinzi nor Mack (2).

Operations I While these momentous events were going forward in the neighbourhood of Dresden, and in the Robenian valleys, events of scarcely less importance were in progress among the ravines of prevented the dreadful disaster which he experienced. They were, to "concentrate his troops and march towards the enemy, so as to be in a situation to lend a helming hand to the operations of the grand army against Dresilen or Boliemia , but, if attacked by superior forces, to retire behind the Quesse and hold Gorlitz; and if hard pressed, and the Linperor was far advanced in his attack, by Littan, upon Prazue, to retire to the intrenched camp at Dresden . keeping in view that his principal care should be to keep in communication with him Instead of following this judicious direction, ligedonald, who was inspired with that unfounded contempt for his adversaries which so often proved fital to the heutenants of Appolion, no sooner found houself, after the departure of the Emperor to Dresden on the morning of the 21th (3), at the head of three corps and a division of cavalry, numbering seventy-live thousand combatants, than he broke up early on the 26th to attack the enemy, whom he concerved still to be concentrated in the position he had taken after his retreat before Nanolion in front of Juner. Instead, however, of following up the Emperor's instructions to concentrate his forces, Micdonald, Impressed with the belief that the enemy was conti-

(1). On the 20th in the evening the Emperor must have known that hundamme had Englist the whole day, not only 220 art the forces of these are huntimes which the transplant up. He had, should be operationally have purposed a software, the defeated union of the allied south year. There was the visal poor of the way all the rest was mently sometary, and almost have been copered.

while a time to define the second of the sec

(1, der, 11 p 212.

(2) * Yundamma a slefeet was a marker an elemtrone for it was to be more bed so on an element who slow at the first prior pleased was, where priors he that parantines remor at a besies weeks. Papulous nuing his retreat in the direction of Breslau, and that he had nothing to do but follow upon his traces, divided his troops, for the facility of marching and getting supplies, into five columns, spread out over a front twenty-four miles in breadth, from Schoenau to Leignitz. In this straggling manner they were to crossthe Katzbach and advance towards Jauer; the right wing, under Lauriston, moving by Schoenau and the foot of the mountains; the centre, under Macdonald in person, by the Wuthende-Neisse on Neinburg; while the left, led by Schostiani and Souham, in the absence of Ney, who had been despatched to command the army destined to act against Berlin, was to move by Leignitz to pass the Katzbach there, and fall on the right of the enemy (1).

By a singular coincidence, Blucher, having rested his troops in their position in front of Jauer on the 24th and 25th, and being informed of the departure of the Emperor for Dresden on the ngainst Macdonald. morning of the first of these days, which the halt of his advanced guard on the Katzbach entirely confirmed, had on the very same day broken up from his ground to resume the offensive. He kept his troops, however, much better in hand, and was better qualified in consequence to take advantage of any omission on the part of his adversaries, or guard against any disaster on his own side. He directed his three corps to pass the Katzbach between Goldberg and Leignitz; D'York and Sacken on the right, towards the latter place, directing their attack against Ney's corps; and Langeron on the left, on the side of Goldberg, moving towards Lauriston and Macdonald. At two o'clock in the afternoon, the troops were so far advanced that the enemy were in sight, and Blucher made his dispositions for a general attack. The better to conceal his movements from the enemy, and confirm them in the illusion under which they laboured, that the Allies were flying before them. he concealed his troops behind some eminences which lay in their front, on the plateau of Eichholz, and awaited the movements of his opponents. A heavy rain, accompanied with thick mist, which had fallen the whole day, contributed to conceal the movements of the opposite armies from each other; and it was only some Prussian batteries placed on the top of the eminences, which, by the vivacity of their fire, made the French suspect that any considerable body of the enemy were in their way, and that a general engagement might be expected. Macdonald immediately gave orders for his columns to deploy at all points between Weinberg and Klein Tiutz; but it required a long time for the orders to be conveyed along so extensive a line; and Blucher, seeing that the enemy had only partially crossed the ravinc of the Neisse, so that the troops which had got through were in a great measure unsupported, and judging the opportunity favourable, and the enemy unprepared, gave the signal for attack (2).

Battle of the katz. Macdonald's right, so far as hitherto come up, when thus unexpectedly assailed, was supported by the rocky banks of the Wuthende-Neisse; but his left was in an elevated plain beyond that river, which its rear columns were still crossing, wholly uncovered except by cavalry under Sébastiani, the squadrons of which were at that moment in part passing the defile. Blucher, perceiving the weak point of his adversary's line, detached Wassilchikoff, at the head of the cavalry of Sacken's corps, to charge the French horse which had mounted upon the plateau, and so uncover their left. This order was immediately executed, and with the happiest effect. The Russian cavalry, superior in number, and greatly more experienced, approached the French dragoous on the extreme left both in front and flank; while Karnoff's Cossacks, who had been sent round by a long detour, were to threaten their rear in the middle of the action Sébastiani's horse, little prepared for the danger, had to struggle through the narrow defile of Krostsch at Acider Cram, alreads encumbered with the whole artiflery of Nev's corns, which was passing it at the time. The consequence was, that the squadrons arrived successively on the plateau on the other side, where they were immediately charged by a formulable body of horse, four thousand strong, in close array, both in front and flank. Unable to resist the shock, the French dragoans were driven back headlong into the defile in their rear, from which they had just emerged; two brigades of infantry, which were brought up to support them, shared the same fate: Sacken's main body now came up, and as the meessant rain prevented the muskets going off, charged with loud burrals with the bayonet against the unprotected infantry of Nev's corps, which broke, and was driven headlong over the precinices into the roating hatzbach and Withende-Acise, where yest numbers were drowned (1). The guns, still entangled in the defile, to the number of twenty-six, with their whole ammunition-wazzons, were taken, and fifteen hundred prisoners on this wing fell into the enemy's lunds (2).

⁽¹⁾ Jom. ir. 373, 410. Viet. et Conq. 80, 81. iv. 361, 362. Lab. i. 327. Bont. 13 Yand. i. 145.

⁽²⁾ Blucher's Official Account. Schooll, Recueil,

nada (2).
To complete their misfortunes, Soulian, who was marching

. ٠,٠ 10.00 . ment, ably conceived and in the true military spirit, would in ardinary circumstances have probably restored the battle, by throwing a fresh division into the scale when the Allies were disordered by success; but as matters stood, it only aggravated the disaster. Souliam's men arrived at the edge of the ravine of kroitedi, just as Schastianl's horse were beginning to break on the plateau opposite. Uniting to Schastiani's cuirassiers, which were left in reserve. Souham immediately led his men down the defile, and hastened to ascend the front, in hopes of reaching the opposite plateau in time to arrest the disorder; but just as they began to mount the corge on the opposite side of the glen, they met the torrent of fugitives from the other side, who were hurrying down, with the bloody Russian and Prussian sabres gianging in their rear. The confusion now became hextricable; the dense and ardent columns pressing up, were for the most part overwhelmed by the disordered mass of horse and foot, mixed togethee, which was driven headlong flown; and such of the hattations and soundrons as succeeded in forcing their way through the throng, and reached the summit, were speedily swept away and driven back into the gulf, when attempting to deploy, by the impetuous charges of a victorious and superior enemy, now firmly established on the summit, who,

with loud hurrals, asserted the triumph of Germany (5).

While this decisive success was in the course of being gained on the course of the little of the success was in the course of the little of the success was in the course of the little of the little is Jon to his his London son all had attended at a fill fil.

⁽¹⁾ The name is it inhades to the about or farmer he see) indicates in the about a toping between that statem, at each arry personal health is every put it were it disting from the Bulemus meantain.

² Kantler 237 618 Ernt 14 12 Subbur Dilinal Asympto, School's, Roma L. ($1, 21 Juni 10 611 612

having learned the disaster on his left, fell back, still, however, in good order, to Praumitz. The action seemed over for the day, when an accidental circumstance renewed it, and augmented the losses of the French general. At nine at night, two fresh divisions of Ney's corps, now under the orders of Souham, having come up, Macdonald in haste crossed them over the Katzbach, at the ford of Schmochowitz, below the confinence of the Neisse, and directed them against the extreme right of Sacken's corps, now advanced to the very edge of the platean, and engaged in driving the other division and Schastiani's horse into the flooded torrents at the foot of the precipitons banks. These divisions were under the command of General Tarayre; they drew with them sixteen pieces of cannon, and ascended to the top of the plateau with a good countenance. Sacken, however, who had received intelligence of their approach, was on his gnard: his troops were rapidly made to front to the right, and these fresh divisions were driven by Count Lieven and General Neweroffski again over the Katzbach, with considerable loss (1).

Next day, Blucher early put his columns in motion to follow up his successes; while Maedonald, in great consternation, drew back on the lot-lowing day, his shattered bands towards Goldberg. It would seem, however, as if the elements had conspired with the forces of the enemy to accomplish his destruction. The floodgates of heaven seemed literally opened the whole night; the rain fell without an instant's intermission in tremendous torrents: and next morning, not only were the raging waters of the Neisse and the Katzbach unfordable at any point, but several of the bridges over those streams, as well as over the Bober, which also lay further back in the line of the French retreat, were swept away by the floods which descended from Aug. 27. the Riesingeberg chain. Lauriston, sorely pressed by Langeron, only succeeded in getting across the foaming torrents by the sacrifice of twoand-twenty pieces of cannon, his whole ammunition-waggons, and two thousand prisoners. On the same day the Allies occupied Goldberg, and, continuing the pursuit, on the day following crossed the Katzbach, and drove the enemy back at all points towards the Bober. All the bridges over that river had been swept away except that at Buntzlau; and of necessity the whole French divisions were directed to that point. In the course of the rapid retreat thither, forty pieces of earmon, and several hundred ammunition waggons were sacrificed, and fell into the enemy's hands (2).

A still more serious disaster, however, awaited the enemy in the Disaster of course of this calamitous retreat. The division Puthod of Lauriston's corps had been dispatched on the 26th, by a circuit at the foot of the mountains by Schoenau and Jauer, in order to menace the rear of the Allies, and harass the retreat which was deemed on their part inevitable. He was already far advanced on his journey, when news of the disaster on the Katzbach arrived; and he at once felt the necessity of hastening to regain the main body of the army. Overlooked by the Allies in the first heat of the pursuit, Puthod succeeded without any great difficulty in retiring during the 27th; but, on arriving at the Bober, he found the bridge at Hirschberg swept away by the floods, and he was obliged to come down the right bank of the torrent to endeavour to effect a passage. Next morning, he got as far down as Lowenberg, but there too the bridge was destroyed; and after several vain attempts to re-establish it, he was obliged to wind his toilsome and devious way, anxiously looking out for a passage, towards

⁽¹⁾ Sacken's Official Account Schooll, Rec. iii. (2) Vict. et Conq. xxii. 83. Jom. iv. 414, 415. 81. Bout. 16. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 83. Jom. iv. Bout. 16, 17. 412, 413.

Buntzlau In doing so, ill luck made hun fall in with the advanced posts of Langeron's corps, who, wholly unsuspicious of his arrival, were pursuing their opponents towards the Bober. The Russian general immediately tollected his forces, and made dispositions for an attack. General korff, with his own horse and Czorbatow's infinity, was dispatched so as to cut off the retreat of the French back again up the Bober, which they seemed at lirst disnosed to attempt, while Rudziwicz was posted on the road to Buntzlau. so as to render all escane impossible. Surrounded in this manner by greatly superior forces, in the most frightful of all positions, with a roaring imnassable torrent in his rear, the brave Frenchman did not despair, but taking ground on the hill of Plagitz, nearly opposite ta I unenberg, prepared to resist to the last extremity. There he was speedily assailed on every side Budgiwicz attacked him on one flank, while Corbatow and borff charged him on the other, and a powerful train of artillery opened upon his columns in front Shaken by such an accumulation of force, as well as by the evident hopelessness of their situation, the French broke, and fled in wild confusion down the hill towards the river, on the banks of which they were, with the execution of a few who swam across the forming torrent, made prisoners. nearly two thousand were slain or drowned. A hundred officers, including Puthod himself, and his whole staff, three thousand private soldiers, two earles, and twelve nicces of cannon, with the whole park of the division, fell into the enemy's hands, who did not lose a hundred men (1)

Such was the great battle of the katzbach, the counterpart to that of Hohenlinden, and one of the most glorious ever gained in the annuls of l'uronean fame. Its troplues were immense, and coincided almost exactly with those which had, twelve years before, attended the triumph of Moreau (2); eighteen thousand prisoners, a hundred and three meers of cannon, and two hundred and thirty carssons, besides seven thousand killed and wounded, presented a total loss to the French of twenty-five thou-and men. When Macdonald reformed his broken bands behind the Oncisse, he could with difficulty collect fifty-tive thousand around his standards, instead of eights thousand, who, when he received the command from Sopoleon, crowded the banks of the Bober. The loss of the Allies was very triffing, considering the magnitude of the success grined it did not exceed four thousand men Indeed, there was scarcely any serious fighting, the French having been surprised by blucher's attack when wholly unprepared for it, and subsequently prescuted, by the dreadful weather and casual destruction of the bridges in their rear by the floods, from remiting their broken lands, or forming any regular mass for resistance to the enemy (5)

or forming any regular mass on restraints on the centry. Great as were the successes thus achieved by the army of Silesia, a state and descreelly as they have given immortality to the name of instance. All starbal I linetic, it may be doubted whether he would not not completely have succeeded in his object of disorganizing the French army, if instead of directing the weight of his forces against the enemy's left, he had thrown it against their right wing, placed at loadlerg, as it was by that town that the whole French canuminications were preserved, and consequently a reverse there would have ent off Southam and the French expended in the properties on the French right was taken, it must be admitted that the Provising reveal showed admittable shill in the selection of his ground for the principal attack.

⁽¹⁾ Langeron a Official Sermonto. School, H. E., 21 Donel, I. 7.13 June 16 415, 61b. Valt et Long 22 Let ut long 127, 41b. E.v. 43 June 16 22 Valt 4 Long 127, 41b. E.v. 43 June 16 27 Valt 4 Lib.

where a precipitous glen in the rear of the French rendered retreat on their part impossible; in the concealment of his own troops till half the enemy was past the ravine; and in then falling on the portion which was drawn up on the plateau, with such a concentration of infantry and cavalry as at once rendered resistance hopeless, and assistance through the narrow gorge impossible. The movements of the French general will not admit of a similar apology. In direct violation of the instructions of Napoléon-which were, to concentrate his troops and decline battle except with a superiority of force -he rashly advanced against an enterprizing general, at the head of an army superior both in number and in warlike experience to his own, with his troops so seattered over a line from Leignitz to Scheenau, nearly thirty miles in length, that, when assailed in his centre and left on most critical ground by the concentrated masses of the enemy, he had no adequate force at hand to arrest the disaster consequent on their first successful onset. Nor was the management of his principal force less injudicious than its direction. By directing the bulk of his troops on the great road from Goldberg to Jauer, Macdonald would at once have menaced his opponent's communications, eovered his own, and secured to himself a comparatively safe retreat in ease of disaster; whereas, by accumulating them on the left, he both uncovered his vital line, left untouched that of his adversary, and got his troops entangled in the rugged ravines of the Katzbach and Wuthende-Neisse, where any check was the certain prelude to ruin (1).

While these important operations were going forward in Saxony, nidotte, and Boliemia, and Silesia, the campaign had also been opened, and an Rapoleon's important blow struck to the north of the Elbe in the direction of important blow struck to the north of the Elbe, in the direction of great an-Berlin. Although nothing is more certain than that the vital quarter of the war was to be found on the Bohemian or Silesian over him. frontier, where the great masses of the Allies were concentrated, yet it was by no means in that direction that Napoléon was desirous to begin hostilities, or most anxious to obtain success. He was much more intent upon making himself master of Berlin; it was to clear his flank of Blueher, before engaging in that enterprize, that he opened the eampaign by the march into Silesia. The first question which he asked when he returned to Dresden, beset by the allied grand army, was, whether there was any news from Berlin; and it was to prosecute that favourite design that he made the fatal stop of the Young Guard at Pirna, and returned himself to Dresden, in the midst of the pursuit of Schwartzenberg's army. Napoléon, however, in his anxiety to dazzle the world by the capture of the Prussian capital, and to gratify his private pique by the defeat of Bernadotte, committed an extraordinary oversight in the estimate which he formed of the strength of the enemy to whom he was opposed in that quarter. He conceived that Bernadotte had only eighty-five thousand men in all under his command, including those who, under Walmoden, were opposed to Davoust at Hamburg; whereas such had been the efforts made to reinforce the army in the north of Germany, and such the enthusiasm with which, under a sense of recent wrongs, they were seconded by the people, that Bernadotte had now ninety thousand men under his immediate command, of whom nearly twenty thousand were admirable cavalry, besides above forty thousand who were opposite to Hamburg, or guarded the banks of the Lower Elbe. With this imposing force, he took post at Charlottenberg to cover Berlin, and concentrate his troops, as soon as the denunciation of the armistice gave reason to anticipate a resumption of hostilities (2).

Advance of Meanwhile, Oudinot received orders to more forward and open and prepared the campaign, but he not being prepared immediately to obey the about Emperor's directions, the Prince-Boy al advanced his headquarters to Potsdam, and his numerous army occupied Jutterbock, Trebbin, and the very villages of Saarmunde and Balitz On the 21st, the French army moved forward, consisting of three cores of infentee are Particular Programming of Ordingles, with Arrichast.

thousand men , and, leaving the great flank movement towards the Wittenbe contact with the foremost posts of Bernadotte's army, and a rude conflict ensued with the advanced guard of Eulow's Prussians, which terminated in the forcing of the defile of Thyrow, and the establishment of Oudinot's forces on the heights behind Trebbin, and in front of Mittenwalde Bernadotte. perceiving that a general battle was nevitable to prevent the enemy from making their way to Berlin, immediately gave orders for concentrating his forces, and the greater part of the day following was occupied in bringing them into line, but before they were all assembled. General Thumen, with a body of Prussians, was attacked by Regnier with sogreat a superiority of force at Trebbin, that he was forced to retire with considerable loss the enemy carried the defile of Julindorff, and the Prince-Royal, now seriously plarmed for his left, drew back, the troops which he had at Trebbin and Mittenwalde, and brought un Taucuzein's whole corps to Blackenfelde Oudinot's object in thus directing the weight of his forces against the enemy's left, was to heat his forces in detail towards Blackenfelde and Telian (1), and force the Prince-Royal, driven un against Potsdam, to throw back his left, and abandon berlin With this view, Hegnler, in the centre, was directed to march on Gross Brings, Bertrand, on the right, on Blackenfelde, while the commander-inchief himself, with the left, moved on Ahrensdorf. He was not now above twelve miles from Berlin, which he fully expected to enter on the following day.

The bittle began early on the morning of the 25d, by the French Rat le of right, under Bertrand, who had the shortest distance to go over before arriving at the enemy, falling with great vicour on Tauenzeln, who with his callant Prossiansheld Blackenfelde Bulow, who was to reserve behind the centre, upon this began to extend his columns to the left to aid his brethren in arms in that quarter, but the movement was countermanded by the Prince-Royal, for Tauenzein had made such a vizorous resistance, that not only were Bertrand's attacks repulsed, but several pusoners were taken, and the line was perfectly safe in that direction Matters, however, wore a more serious aspect in the centre, where Reguler, at the head of twenty-four thousand Saxons, supported by a strong reserve, attacked and carried Cross Lecren, and established bimself close to the very centre of the affect line Bernadotto, sensible of the dangerous consequences of this success, Instantly took the most vicorous measures to arrest it l'ulow's whole corns was stopped in its march to the left, and brought up to the support of the centre, which had retired, still, however, I ravely habiton, to some woods in the rear of the village Meanwhile Reguler, little anticipating a second runfl et, an I deeming the combat over, was preparing to estal fish fuls blyouace for the night on if e ground he lad won, when Halow (2 , at the head of thirty five thousand Prussiant, fell upon him

¹ Yet at Lare 3311 31 23 Franklass (2 Resubbrea Officia Esperi Schmit, Forest, 1765 of April 2014), Tar extens, 22 Jun 21 10, 176 of 176, 177

The measures of the Prussian general were taken with great ability, and he was admirably seconded by the intrepidity of his centre at troops. While he himself advanced with the main body of his forces to recover Gross Beeren in front, Borstel, with a strong brigade, was moved on to Klein Beeren, in order to turn the right of the enemy, and the Swedish horse were advanced so as to threaten their left. The troops adwanced in two lines, preceded by sixty pieces of cannon, and followed by the eavalry in reserve; incessant rain had fallen the whole day, which prevented the muskets from going off; but the eannon on both sides soon opened a tremendous fire, while, in rear of the Prussian pieces, their infantry advanced with the precision and coolness of the troops of the great Frederick. At length they arrived within grapeshot range, and Bulow immediately ordered a charge of bayonets by the front line deployed, while the second followed in column. The struggle, though violent, was not of long duration: Regnier, assailed by superior forces in front, could with difficulty maintain his ground; and the attack of Borstel on his right, and the opening of the Swedish eannon, supported by an immense body of Russian horse on his left, decided the conflict. He was already beginning to retreat, when the Prussians in front, with loud hurrahs, charged with the bayonet. Gross Beeren was speedily won, several batteries were carried, and the allied horse, by repeated charges on the left flank, completed his defeat. Ondinot's corps, alarmed by the violence of the cannonade at this period, stopped their advance on Abrensberg, and, hastening to the centre, came up in time to arrest the disorder. Behind their fresh columns the broken Saxons were enabled to re-form; but it was too late to regain the day. The Prussians, indeed, ignorant of the strength of the new army which they had thus encountered in the twilight, retired from the pursuit, and even at the moment evacuated Gross Beeren; but the defeat of the French centre determined the retreat of their left: their whole army retired to Trebbin, while Bulow reoccupied Gross Beeren, and Tauenzein advanced to Julindorf (1).

Although the battle of Gross Beeren was not attended with such the battle. extensive trophies in the field as those of Culm or the Katzhaeh, yet in its moral influence, and the effects which it finally had on the fortunes of the campaign, it was almost equal to either of these memorable conflicts. Fifteen hundred prisoners, thirteen cannon, and a large quantity of baggage, were taken; but these were its most inconsiderable results. The moral influence of the defeat of the attack on Berlin, was immense. Great had been the consternation in that capital when the enemy's columns were advanced almost to within sight of its steeples, and every house shook with the discharges of their cannon; they remembered Jena and six years' bondage, and every heart throbbed with emotion. Proportionally vehement was the joy when news arrived at ten at night that the enemy had been repulsed, that his columns were retiring, and the capital saved; and the general transports were increased by the circumstance, that the triumph was exclusively national-Bulow and Tauenzein having, with their new Prussian levies, almost alone had a share in the action. The warmest thanks were next day voted by the municipality to the Prince-Royal as their deliverer; joy beamed in every countenance; great numbers of the Saxon prisoners, carried away by the torrent of patriotic feeling, petitioned to be allowed to serve in the ranks of the fatherland, and formed the nucleus of the Saxon corps which soon appeared in the lines of the Allies; while several of the officers, who had

⁽¹⁾ Bont. 53, 54. Jom. iv. 407, 408. Vict, et Conq. xxii, 99, 100. Vaud. i. 166, 167

for joy at finding the banners of Subsequent. The hattle of Gross Beeren was immediately followed by other the lamb successes, naturally flowing from the former, which materially augmented its trophies. On the 25th, Bernadotte moved forward, though yery slowly and with extreme circumspection; but the enemy were so sexttered that he could not fail, with his superiority in cavalry, to gain considerable advantages Tuckan had been fortified by the French, and garrisoned by a thousand men; but the covernor not conceiving himself in sufficient strength to withstand the assault of the Albes, by whom he was 500n surrounded, capitulated, when summoned, with nine pieces of cannon. and considerable magazines. A still more serious disaster soon after occurred on the sale of Magdehurg Gerard, with his division, five thousand strong, had issued from that fortress as soon as he heard of the advance of fludings. on prior to an answering in the annount margament and of Paul n.) it the the without being aware of it, into the very middle of the enemy's columns. Finding Belgig occurred by the Cossaels of Czhernichell, he withdrew to Lichnitz, where he took nost to await further orders. There he was assailed next day by a division of the Prussians under Hirschfeld; and after a gallant resistance, being attacked in year by Cabernichell's Cossacks, he was totally defeated, and connelled to take refuse in Magdelurg, with the loss of fourteen hundred prisoners and six pieces of cannon. These advantages made the total results of the battle of tross Beeren four thousand prisoners, besides an equal number killed and wounded, and twenty-ciclit guns; while the Albes were not weakened by more than half the number. These results, considerable as they were, might have been greatly augmented. If Bernadotte had made a proper use of the supersority of force, and great preponderance in cavalry, which he emoved: but he was so cantions he his movements, that though he had no force to withstand him in the field, and the enemy fell back at all points, he took eleven days to advance from Gross Beeren to Italianstein, near the 1 lbe, where he established his headquarters on the 4th September, though the distance was little more than whole north of Germany. Napoléon was strongly affected by these reverses, the more so as they were quite unexpected; and he immediately began, as usual, to lay the whole blame upon his lieutenants (1). Circumstances, however, were so pressing, and succours were demanded from so many quarters at once, that it was no easy matter to say to which direction the Emperor should turn with the anxiously expected relief. His first design was to reinforce the army of the north, and resume in person, and with the aid of his guards, his favourite project of a march upon Berlin. But Maedonald's represesentations of the disastrous state of the army of Silesia were so urgent, and the advance of the enemy on that side so threatening, that he at length determined, though much against his will, to direct his steps towards Bautzen and the banks of the Bober (2).

In pursuance of this resolution, orders were immediately given to stop at all points the pursuit of the allied columns into Bohemia; measures of Napoléon for the pro- the broken remains of Vandamme's corps, entrusted to the care of Count Lobau, after being inspected at Dresden by the Emperor, were reconducted to the inhospitable summits of the mountains at Gieshubel and Peterswalde; St.-Cyr's corps was stationed between the latter point and Altenberg; while Victor occupied the passes and crest of the range from that to the right towards Reichenberg and Freyberg. The command of the army of the north was entrusted to Ney; the Emperor being with reason dissatislied with Oudinot, for the senseless dispersion of his force which had led to the check at Gross Beeren, as well as for the eccentric direction of his retreat towards Wittenberg instead of Torgau, thereby putting in hazard the interior line of communication between the army of the north and the centre of operations at Dresden, and even exposing Macdonald's rear and supplies to the risk of being cut off or disquieted by the clouds of light horse, which inundated the plains beyond the Elbe, from Bernadotte's left. To prevent this inconvenience, and keep up the communication between the armies of Ney and Macdonald, Marmont's corps was withdrawn from the pursuit of the allied grand army, and transferred to Hoyerswerda, on the right bank of the Elbe, nearly midway between them; while the Emperor himself, taking with him the guards and reserve cavalry, and calling to his standard Poniatowski's corps, which had hitherto lain inactive in observation at Zittau, proceeded with sixty thousand choice troops to reinforce the dejected remains of the army which had been shaken by the disasters of the Katzbach. Thus, after all the losses from the preceding defeats were taken into account, sixty thousand men were left under St.-Cyr, Victor, and Murat, to make head against the grand army of the Allies on the left of the Elbe; a hundred and twenty thousand, under the Emperor in person, were directed against Blucher in Silesia; seventy thousand, under Ney, were opposed to the army of Bernadotte; and eighteen thousand, under Marmont, were in observation, and kept up the communications on the right bank of the Elbe (5).

^{(1) &}quot;Mon cousio le Due de Tarente (Macdonald) s'est laissé pousser sur Gorlitz. Il sera possible que je sois oblige de marcher sur Bautzen, demain on après demain. Occupez done promptement les positions défensives."—Naroléon to St.-Cra, 1st September 1831. St.-Cra, iv. 391.

[&]quot; Mon cousin, cerivez au Prince de la Moskwa (Ney). Nous venons de recevoir des nouvelles du Due de Reggio (Oudinot), qui a jugé convenable de venir se mettre à deux marches au - dessus de Wittenberg. Le résultat de ce mouvement intempestif est, que le corps du Général Tanenzein et un fort parti de Cosaques se sont portés du côté de Luckau et do Bautzen, et inquiètent les communications du Dne de Tarente. Il est vraiment difficile d'asoir moins de tête que le Duc de Reggio. Il n'a point su aborder l'enoemi, et il a eu l'art de faire donner un de ses corps séparement. S'il l'eut abordé The conduct of the set of the separament. Stiff the conduction of the separation of

The Emperor's own movement, as usual, was attended with the Napoléon advances acainst desired effect. On the 5d of September, Napoleon set out from choffwerda, by the Cossacks from Bernadotte's army. Marmont was pushed forward in that direction, to prevent a repetition of the insult, and finally took post at Hoyerswerda On the following morning, Napoléon set out by break of day, and early in the forenoon came in contact with the advanced guard of Blucher, which was strongly posted on the high grounds of Stromberg and Vohlaerherg, beyond Hochkirch, on the road to Gorlitz The Prussian generals soon perceived, from the increased activity in the French army, and the splendld array of troops which crowded the roads coming from Dresden, that the Emperor was before them; and Blucher, faithful to the instructions lie had received, and the general system agreed on at Tra-chenherg, immediately fell back. The French, continuing to advance, soon reoccupied Gorlitz, while Blucher's retiring columns repassed successively both the Queisse and the Neisse Napoléon slept on the night of the 5th in tho parsonage manse of the parish of Hochkirch, and on the following morning resumed his march in pursuit of the allied troops, hoping that the impetuous character of the Prussian marshal, flushed with his recent victory, would lead hum to halt and give hattle Blucher, however, still continued to retreat; and the armies of his neutenants, when ich to themselves, havery tree famed to be involved in disaster. At the close of his reverse his started up, and ordered the guards and currassiers to return to Dresden, leaving Marmont in such a situation at Hoyerswerda, as to be able to lend assistance, in case of need, either to Ney or Macdonald His presence at the Saxon capital was much required, for already the Allies were beginning to resume the offensive on the frontier of Bohemia, and a terrible disaster had been incurred to the north of the Elbe (1)

Ney, who had been appointed to replace Oudinot in the command Ney a move of the army of the north, had received the Emperor's instructions atains Bernadatte to march direct to Bartith, where a corps was to be waiting him to L----1 Il woo las et march from Bor.

together, and put a good countenance on the matter, all that rabble would soon disperse, and he would find the road to the Prussian capital he open before him (2). Ney, in pursuance of these instructions, and impelled not less by the ardonrof his own disposition than the express command of Napoleon,

⁽¹⁾ Faln in 325 326 Fout 70 71 Old, 1 259 Nett et Corg xx : 105 105 (2) "From Baruth you will be only there days march Town Ferf : The communication with the I'mperor will then be e tirely established, and the attack on the Prussian cap tal may take place on the 5th ac 10th I miant. All that cloud of Lamacks and rabble of land rebr infantry will fall tack on all a des when your march is once decidedly talen log will no lerstand the novers to of mor ng taj id ly in ord r to take advantage of the present state of inefficiency of the allied grand semy in Eche wis sepect til fat og sames teconstrate obetrium spa mouse at that they become aware of the departure of the Emperic,"—in therefore to Nav. 21 September 1813 Sr. Cas. iv 391 immediately put himself in motion. He arrived at the headquarters of the army on the 4th of September, and found the whole troops arranged under shelter of the cannon of Wittenberg-a state of things which sufficiently evinced the entire incapacity of Oudinot for separate command; for he had now altogether lost his communication with the central point of Dresden, and permitted the whole right bank of the Elbe, between that fortress and the Saxon capital, to be inundated by a deluge of Russian and Prussian light horse, who did incredible mischief to the communication and supplies of both armies. Having reviewed his troops, and encouraged them by the assurance of prompt succour from the Emperor, Ney immediately put them in motion on the morning of the 5th, directing his march by Zahna and Seyda, so as to regain'the high-road from Torgau to Berlin, which was his proper line of communication with the grand headquarters at Dresden. On the evening of the same day, the army was established on a line between these two villages, the Prussian advanced posts rapidly retiring before them. On the other hand, the Prince-Royal no sooner ascertained that the enemy were marching in strength against him, headed by his old comrade Marshal Ney, with whose determined character in the field he was well acquainted, than he took measures for concentrating his army. Setting out from Rabbastein, where his headquarters had been established, he marched across the country, so as to regain the great road between Torgau and Berlin. Tanenzein, who formed the advanced guard of his army, reached Dennewitz early on the morning of the 6th, and soon found himself in front of the vanguard of the French army, which, in its march from Zalma and Seyda, had approached that village on the route to Juterbock, where the great road from Torgau would be regained. Tauenzein immediately drew up his troops in order of battle, and unmasked a powerful battery, the fire of which arrested the progress of the Italian troops under Count Bertrand. The French general, however, was not disconcerted, but bringing up his remaining divisions, re-established the coinbat; the French artillery, posted on higher ground, played with advantage upon that of the Allies, and Morand advancing with his division, which was composed in great part of veterans, sensibly gained ground, and threatened the left wing of the Allies, which had first come into action, with total defeat (1).

Battle of Succour, however, was at hand; for Bulow, who commanded the allied centre, which was marching up immediately after their left wing and in the same direction, no sooner heard the cannonade on the side of Dennewitz, than he hastened his march, and arrived with twenty thousand Prussians, whom he deployed with the corps under Hesse Homberg in reserve; and not contented with remaining in position, he immediately directed the troops by an oblique advance against the flank of Bertrand's corps, which was now pushing Tauenzein before it, in front of Dennewitz. The Prussians advanced in echelon by the left, but, before they could reach the enemy, Regnier, with the Saxons, had come up to the support of Bertrand, and a combat of the most obstinate description ensued; the French centre and left presenting a front on the two sides of an oblique triangle to the enemy, and the Prussians urging them on both its faces. After four hours' hard fighting, however, the enthusiasm of the Prussians prevailed over the intrepidity of the Saxons. The village of Nieder Gerstorf and Gohlsdorf were successively carried, and the French centre and left driven back in the direction of Ohna (2).

⁽¹⁾ Vaud. i. 171. Bout. 61, 62. Jom. iv. 419, (2) Vaud. i. 172. Vict. at Conq. xxii. 103. Bout. 420. Jom. iv. 420, 421.

Arrival or Ney, however, now came up in biste with Oudinot's corps, which was stationed to the left of the Savons, and immediately in front control of Blulon's right. The arrival of this fresh corps, fully twenty thousand strong, made an immediate change upon the field of bittle. The two corps uniting, tirried fiercely on their pursuers, and being superior in numbers, not only regained Gohlsdorf, but drove the Prussans entirely across the road to the high grounds near Wilmsdorf, from which Bulow had originally come Bulow upon this brought forward his reserve, the Savons, though they combited bravely, were forced in their tirrit to retreat, and Gohlsdorf, the object of such fierce contention, a second time fell into the

when, at this critical moment, the Prussian brigade of Borstel, which was marching in the rear across the country towards Juterhock, informed, near Talischan, of the critical state of matters on the allied right, appeared on the field, and immediately attacked, with loud cheers, the extreme left of Oudinot in flank. At the same time, the Prussians under Thumen, who had comhated behind Dennewitz ever since the morning, resuming the offensive, rigorously attacked and carried that village, and drove back Bertrand's corps, who were excessively fatigued with their long march and subsequent combat, to a considerable distance. The effect of this double advantage occurring at the same time, was decisive Nev, finding both his wings driven back, and his centre in danger of being enveloped by the enemy, gave orders for a retreat at all points. This retrograde movement, however, was conducted with great regularity, the French brayed, without shrinking, the destructive fire of grape-shot from the enemy's numerous batteries, which were now Jurried to the front, and several charges of the Prussian horso were repulsed by the rolling fire and steady conduct of their retiring columns (1)

Arrived of Hitherto the Prussian army, not in all above forty five thousand By about strong, had singly maintained the conflict, with heroic resolution, with the with the break of against the French, who numbered seventy thousand combitants thereor The Swedes and Russians, composing nearly a half of the array, had not yet come into action, having composed the right of the column of march, which was advancing with the left in front. But Bernadotte, with this powerful reserve, having broken up in the morning from Lobesson and Lehmansdorf, had now reached hattenborn, a league in rear of Dennewitz, where the battle was raging, and, forming his whole force in order of battle, advanced rapidly to the support of the Prussians, now wellingli exhausted by their long and ardnous exertions. The appearance of this imposing mass on the field of battle, where Ney had no longer a reserve on his part to oppose to them, was decisive Seventy battalions of Russians and Swedes, sunported by ten thousand horse of the two nations, and preceded by a hundred and fifty pieces of cannon, advanced in beautiful array of columns of attack. with sufficient space left between them for the front file to deploy, and form a continuous line. Nev. who had not been able to succeed in his attack upon the Prussians alone, was in no condition to maintain his ground when this fresh and formidable body came upon him. Disorder and vaciliation speedily became visible in his retreating columns, soon four thousand Russian and Swedish cavalry advanced at the gallop to support the points of the Prussian line, where the contest was most obstinately maintained, and the ranks were no longer kept, when Bulow's men, opening with admirable discipline, made room for the infantry of the reserve to advance, and the Russian eavalry, charging furiously through the apertures, swept like a forcent round the French retreating columns (1).

The retreat soon turned into a flight: in vain Ney endeavoured to hold firm, with the Saxons in the centre, who were hitherto unbroken, near Rohrbeck; the troops there, too, were seized with a sudden panie on seeing their flanks turned by the Swedish and Russian horse, and, breaking into disorder, fled in confusion. The effects of this rout of the centre were in the highest degree disastrous; the enemy rushed into the huge gap thus formed in the middle of the line, and, vigorously pursuing the fugitives, separated the right from the left wing. In vain Arrighi brought forward his dragoons to cover the retreat; a thick cloud of dust enveloped the advancing squadrons of the pursuers, and rendered them more terrible from being museen. Arrighi's men were shaken by the terrors by which they were surrounded, and wayered before reaching the enemy. Soon they were overwhelmed by the torrent, and drawn into its vortex before the Russian sabres were upon them; and at length the whole army presented nothing but a vast mass of fugitives. Ney did all that courage and coolness could suggest to arrest the disorder; but it was in vain: his utmost efforts could only preserve some degree of order in the retiring cannoniers, who, by rapidly working their gnns, prevented the total destruction of the centre; but the wings were irrevocably separated. Ondinot, with his own corps and a part of the Saxons, retreated to Schweinitz; while Ney himself, Bertrand, and the cavalry, got off to Daline. On the day following, additional successes were gained by the Allies: Ney's rearguard was attacked by the victorious Prussians, and defeated, with the loss of lifteen hundred prisoners; and during the night six hundred more were taken by their light horse, with eight pieces of cannon. It was not till the 8th that the French general succeeded in remniting his shattered and divided columns, under cover of the cannon of Torgan (2).

Result of the loss of the French in the battle of Dennewitz was very severe. the battle. It amounted, in the battle and subsequent retreat to Torgan, to thirteen thousand men, of whom one-half were prisoners; with forty-three pieces of cannon, seventeen caissons, and three standards; besides six thousand stand of arms which the fugitives threw away to accelerate their flight. The Allies lost nearly six thousand men, of whom five thousand were Prussians; a clear proof upon whom the weight of the battle had fallen, and with whom the glory of the victory should rest. But its moral consequences were far more important. The Prussian troops, of whom a large proportion were landwehr, had here defeated the French in a pitched battle, led by one of their most renowned chiefs: the stain of Jena was washed out: the days of Rohrbeck and the Great Frederick seemed about to return; and Berlin, no longer trembling for foreign occupation, might send forth her sons conquering and to conquer on the brightest fields of European fame (5).

Reflections on the barishes the barishes of Emopean Tame (3).

The French military historians, confounded at this defeat—which they could neither ascribe to the cold, as in Russia, nor to the force of overwhelming numbers, as on the second day at Culm, nor to flooded rivers, as at the Katzbach—have laboured to save the honour of their arms

⁽¹⁾ Bernadotte's Official Acet. Schnell, iii. 116. Bout. 64, 65. Vict. et Conq. axii. 104, 105. Yaud. i. 172, 173.

i. 172, 173.

(2) Bernadotte's Official Acet. Schooll, iii. 117.
Bout. 64, 65. Jom. iv. 422, 423. Vaud. i. 173,

⁽³⁾ Bernadotte's Official Acet. Schooll, Recueil, iii. 117. Viet, et Conq. xxii, 105. Bout. 66. Jour. iv, 421.

hy ascribing it entirely to the incapacity of Marshal Nev, who had no head, they affirm for previous combination, and never received any illumination of genius till the enemy's balls were whirling through the bayonets. Without ascribing the disaster entirely to this cause, it must be admitted that the conduct of the French marshal on this occasion was not such as to support his great reputation Like Oudinot at Gross Beeren, he was surprised by an attack on his line of march when little prepared for it, and under circumstances when such an event was not only probable but certain. When her took the cammand of the army under the cannon of Wittenberg. it was completely concentrated, and occupied a position of all he the gen others best adapted to act with effect on the army of the Allies. then occupying a line above twenty miles in length, from Rabenstein to Sayda Instead of this, he brought up his columns in sa desultory a manner to the attack, that he was never able to take any advantage of the great superiority of force which he might have thrown upon any point of the enemy's line, and in the end had the whole hostile array on his hands, before he had been able to make any impression on the corps first engaged. In justice, however, to the French marshal at must be observed, that he was on this occasion very indifferently aided by his lieutenants, and that Oudinot, in particular, stung to the quick by having been deprived of the command, by no means pressed forward into action with the alacrity which might have been expected from his character. This realousy of the marshals of each other, already 50 long known and sorely experienced in the Peninsular war, had already risen to such a height in Germany, as to render all cordial co operation, except under the immediate eve and authority of the Emperor impossible (1)

Nar was the conduct of the Prince-Royal, though crowned with success, by any means beyond the reach of reproach. Great as his victory was, it would have been much more decisive, if, instead of marching with his reserves on Eclimandorf and Wilmersdorf, that is, in the rear of the Prussian line of battle, at the distance of five miles, he had follawed the mirch of Taner.

havo

of the

made no sufficient use of the unparalleled advantage of having utterly routed the enemy's centre, and separated their two wings fram each other his nolle cavalry were not, on the day after the battle, thrown with sufficient vigour on the traces of the enemy, and an erray which had been routed on the field, in a way hardly to be equalled in modern war, was allowed to retire with scarcely any molestation to the Libe, and reunite its dissovered wings at Torgau, while the victor remained mactive at Juterbock, only a few miles from the field of battle (2)

the nebt but if the conduct of Bernadotte, both at Dennewitz and Gross conduct of the Press Beeren, was open to serious reproach, and indicated not obscurely be form to be but of the press of the deep, and not to push the advantages even gained by the Prussians to the utmost, the vigour, resolution, and expactly evinced by the Prussian generals, especially Ilulow and Borstel, in bearing up with inferior means for half the day, against superior forces on the part of the enemy, were most conspicuous, and, in particular, the perfect unautmity and concord with which they supported each other on every trying occasion, and the true inditary institlet which led lettern, at once and without orders, to hasten where the cannon was loudest and the danger greatest, were beyond all praise; and, seconded by the devotion and valour of their brave though inexperienced followers, mainly contributed to the victory on both these glorious days. Never, in truth, was a more animated spectacle witnessed than the Prussian army exhibited at that period. Jealousies there were none in that noble array: individual interests, separate desires, were forgotten; old established feuds were healed; recent rivalries were suppressed: one only feeling, the love of country, throbbed in every heart; one only passion, the desire to save it, gave strength to every hand (1).

The repeated defeats which he had thus experienced in every The repeated defeats which he had thus experienced in every feats destroy quarter, and under circumstances where the faults of generalship appeared to he pretty equally divided between the contending parties, at length brought home to Napoleon the painful conviction, that neither his own troops nor those of his opponents were what they onee had been. However much the adulation of his military courtiers might at the time, or the fond partiality of his subsequent panegyrists may still, be inclined to ascribe these misfortunes to errors of conduct on the part of the generals at the head of the movements, or to inconceivable fatality, their reiterated occurrence, under every variety of command, officers and troops engaged, was sufficient to demonstrate to all unprejudiced observers, that the long established superiority of the revolutionary troops was at an end. In presence of the Emperor, indeed, and with the consciousness that his rcdoubtable guards and cuirassiers were at hand to arrest any disorder, the eonscripts evinced extraordinary cnthusiasm, and still performed heroic aetions; and the able use which he long made of that formidable reserve of fifty thousand ehosen veterans, in battles where he commanded in person, arrested the tide of disaster. But where this great cause of enthusiasm and tower of strength was wanting, the usual appearances of a sinking cause were apparent. The marshals wanted vigour, and had become timid and over circumspect; or were unduly rash and overweening in their movements: the troops generally went into battle with eourage, but they failed to sustain it with eonstaney; and on 'the first appearance of a reverse took to flight by whole battalions, or laid down their arms, like the Austrians in the beginning of the war, in large bodies. Thirty thousand prisoners and two hundred guns had been taken by the Allies in pitched battles, within three weeks after the resumption of hostilities; while the Russians retreated from the Niemen to Moseow, a distance of six hundred miles, in presence of four hundred thousand men in close pursuit, without one battalion being broken or one eannon taken. A change therefore had plainly come over the spirit of the eontest; the old enthusiasm of the Revolution was worn out, the military array of the empire had broken down; while its oppression had roused an indomitable spirit of resistance on the other side, and its antagonists had learned, in comhating, to conquer it. The effects of this truth being perceived, were in the highest degree important: Napoléon lost confidence in his troops and his fortune, and no longer exhibited those daring strokes which had so often in former campaigns crowned him with success; while his marshals evineed that dread of responsibility, and nervousness about consequenees, which are the invariable attendants, save among those whom a sense of duty supports, of the secret anticipation of disaster.

While these events were taking place in the northern line of operations, the allied grand army had resumed the offensive on the Bohemian frontier. No scone of sooner was Schwartzenherg made aware, hy the cessation of the time to pursuit of his columns, that Napoleon had set out in a different feet by the frection, than he put his troops in motion, again to threaten the Saxon capital. On the 5th September, Writgenstein crossed the mountains with the right wing, and pushed his advanced guard to Nollendorf, and on Sept a the following day he reached Greshithel, while Ziehlen occupied Gross hoeta, and Count Pahlen and Prince Lugine of Writemberg, who had september to the following day he processed by Hennersdorf, took possession of Nentiquasidorf On the mountains in the rear of the Russians, and on the one reason. With the Taphitz, while certain intelligence was received that Benningson, with the reason of the certain intelligence was advancing by rapid strides the before the end of Septem-

the opinion from St-Cir, that the system of the enemy is, to hazard nothing on the points where the Em-

as they are withdrawn, the one march of Dresden, on terswalde (1)

Napoleon had no sooner received this intelligence than he took remark the measures for the concentration of his troops on the side of silesa, of the concentration of his troops on the side of silesa, by ordering blacdonald to retire to Bautzen, near which Ponnaat such distances from the compa, and might be able, with the chirds and reserve, to carry succour to any quarter where their assi great strength, the Austrians w distance, from the side of Prague The Emperor net Salvage, delivering some decisive blow, to extricate himself from his difficulties; and immediately after joined Marshal St. -Cyr, in the neighbourhood of Pirna, on the evening of the 7th, he had a long conversation will that able general, in

(1) Dout 71 72 Vict of Cong axis 206, 107 St Cyr to Napoleon, 3, 4, 5 and Sept. 7, 1813 Ste Cyr. 10 397 405

(2) Number of different persons who were quartered in Deceden and its subarbs during the periods

From 26th Feb. to 2.th Mar. 1813 1 roun 26th Mar. to 7th May,		117,338 203 600	OM Town 67 3-0 93 852	3aburbs 43 832 49 128	Frederichted 8 383 21 137	236 805 231 727
From 5th May to 18th Jame From 15th June to 15th Kurember, From 16th Koy to 31st December		409 146 1,433,275 250,375	274 T02 1 278 157 262 616	213 837 1 523,395 610 068	99.513 633 311 61 160	1,059 293 5 04 2 871 611 219 2 712 313
From 1st Jan to 31st December 1811	٠	1,057 -03	2 331,389	2 725 190		10 0*9,220

the course of which he admitted, that "he had lost a brilliant opportunity of striking such a stroke, by halting the Young Guard at Pirna when Vandamme was advancing to Culm;" but still inclined to the opinion that it should now be directed towards Blueher or Bernadotte, and insisted that the grand allied army would attempt nothing during his absence. Impressed with these ideas, sept. 8. which St.-Cyr in vain combated with military frankness, he returned to Dresden the same night, meditating a great blow against Bernadotte, and consequent triumphal entry into Berlin; but early next morning he was roused from his dream of security, and recalled to the advanced posts on the side of Pirna by the sound of cannon, which announced a formidable attack by the Russian vanguard in that quarter (1).

Quick as lightning, Napoléon moved up his guards and chirassiers to the scene of action, and after reconnoitring the enemy's columns from the heights of Gahrnig, determined that, although the great body of his reserves had not yet come up, it was advisable not to delay the attack, as by the next day the platean which the enemy occupied would be so strongly supported by artillery as to be altogether unassailable. He, accordingly, forthwith put his troops in motion, and, aiming his movement against the left of the allied advanced guard, he directed the weight of his forces towards Liebstadt, whereby he threatened their communications with Teplitz. To avoid that danger, Wittgenstein immediately withdrew his men, and joined Kleist at Nollendorf; while at the same time Klenau's Austrians, who had been pushed on towards Chemnitz, retired to Marienberg. The arrival of Napoléon was felt like a shock along the whole line of the Bohemian hills (2).

Assembled in front of Dresden, and opposed to the great Allied army.

				Aug. 13th	Sept. 20th.	Sept. 24th.
Old Guard,			_	6,607	4,000	25,000
Young Guard,		•	•	32,000	24,000 }
Cavalry of the Guard,	•	•	•	10,500	6,000	3,000
Vandamme,	• •	Ť	•	25,000	4,000	6,000
Victor,		•	•	21,000 .	18,000	14,000
Marmont,		•	•	30,000	20,000	18,000
Poniatowski,	• •	•	•	15,000	10,000	11,000
StCyr,	• •	•	٠	31,000	20,000	20,000
Latour-Maubourg's Cavalry,	• •	:	٠	10,000	6,000	7,000
natom-pandanoung s cavany,	• •	•	•	10,000	0,000	7,000
Tota	l, .	•		181,107	112,000	104,000
Opposed to the Northern Arn	ny. un	der	the	e Crown-Prin	nce of Sweden
- "
Bertrand,	• •	•	•	21,000	14,000	15,000
Regnier,		•	•	20,000	8,000	6,000
		•	٠	21,000	10,000	18,000
Arrighi and Kellerman (Cavalry),	• •	•	•	10,000	7,000	6,000
Tota	1, .			75,000	39,000	45,000
Opposed to	o Blue	her	in	Silesia.
,
Souliam,		•	•	32,000	22,000	18,000
Lauriston,		•	•	35,000	10,000	3,000
Macdonald,		•	•	21,000	14,000	12,000
Sébastiani and Milhaud (Cavalry),	• •	•	•	13,000	3,000	5,000
• •
Total on the right,				101,000	49,000	38,000
Total on the left,			_	75,000	39,000	45,000
· Total at Dresden,		•		181,107	112,000	101,000
		•	•		22,000
						187,000
Grand To	otal,	•	•	357,107	200,000	A COLAN - O
1 777 1 (1

⁻Bunguersn's War in Germany in 1813, p. 316.

⁽¹⁾ St.-Cyr, iv. 140, 143. Bout. 72. Vaud. i. 176.

⁽²⁾ Three different approximative statements of the force of the French army received at the head-quarters of the Allies:--

Satisfied with this advantage, Aapoléon retired to his quarters at Dahme, where he received from Ney's aide-de-camp the whole details of the disaster at Dennewitz. The Emperor interrogated him closely as to all the particulars, which in the end

Scipio and Hannibal, but had the magnanimity to exculpate entirely the general whose errors had had no small share in inducing it (2).

On the following morning, at daybreak, St -Cyr's corps pursued Nameléon read es the its march, and reached without opposition the village of Ebersdorf, rement of on the Geversberg-the highest point of the mountains between abe make the moon Saxon and Bohemia; and from the heights adjoining which the eye can discover a considerable expanse of the platos from Templitz towards Prague No sooner had the Emperor set foot on the frontier, than he dispatched a messenger to the hing of Saxony to announce that the enemy was thrown back into Bohemia, and then halted to gaze at the prospect which opened before him. Immediately at his feet descended the rapid slope of the Geversberg, its sides, naked rocks or hanging woods, with the road, which was much cut up by the retreat of the allied troops from Dresden, descending in zigzag down the steep, till it was lost in the gulf at its feet. The artillers with extraordinary alacrity thren themselves into the hollow, and already the till it was repaired. A few liours only, honever, were required for that purpose, and Aapoleon had himself shown, at the passages of the Landgrafensberg, tho evening before the battled of beat (3), how quickly the most formulable obstacles of that description yield to the vigorous exertions of a shifful holy of engineers (4).

(1) Napoléon a conversation on this occasion which is niported by $1.07 who was present was yeary symachables— The Improve natestragated the officer intouter and entered with the most importurbable range of into the movements of the different corps; after which he explained in a different corps; after which he explained in a would write a book on the subject in which he would demonstrate its principles in a man er so andly, sed who had apprenached nearest to the end which he proposed to demon trate if one day he had ture to compose the work which he had man i omed. Hat conversation was prought on 19 the sectated one of the greatest of existers of the cam-

^{2) 51} Cyr iv 117 150 Dout 73 71

⁽¹⁾ Autr. v 260

^[1] Odel L 2"# Fain, 11 334 51 Cyr, fr 137

St.-Cyr eagerly pointed to the plain at the foot of the mountain, But dewhere the Russian and Prussian army were to be seen in great masclines to descend to ses, deploying, widening, and extending, as if in preparation for an Culm, or enter Boimmediate attack. From the rapidity of their movements, the eonfusion which prevailed, and the hurrying of officers to and fro, it was evident that they expected to be instantly assailed, for which they were little prepared, and that their leaders were in great anxiety for the result, as their situation and the nature of the ground in their rear would not admit of a retreat in presence of the enemy; while a huge column of smoke, the agreed on signal, rising from the elevated summits of the Millerschauer, the highest point of the range, told to the whole north of Bohemia that the dreaded invasion of the Franks had commenced. Prince Constantine's reserve of the guards were the first in position, next Wittgenstein's Russians, and Kleist's Prussians, formed in close array, but still there was no appearance of the Austrians; and St.-Cyr strongly urged the Emperor to hasten the attack, when his whole forces were at hand, and the Russians and Prussians, in a position from which they could not recede, stood alone exposed to his blows. Napoléon, who, from the elevated position which he occupied, beheld every rank, almost every man, in the hostile array, remained with the telescope at his eye, intently gazing on the enemy for above an hour; but at the end of that time he said, "I will not attack the enemy in that position—but eautiously conceal my intention: let the engineers continue to repair the road to-day and to-morrow; and suffer every one to rest in the belief that we are to have a great battle; if you are attacked on the mountain, I will support you." So saying, he returned to Pirna much dejected at the failure of his designs, and the day after re-entered Dresden; having thereby lost the only opportunity which presented itself during the campaign, of engaging on favourable terms the Russians and Prussians when detached from the Austrians (1).

St.-Cyr's sinister presentments were not long of being verified; The Allies again attack St. Cy no sooner were the Allies aware, by the cessation of the advance, that Napoléon was no longer on the summit of the Erzgebirge, than they again resumed at all points their offensive movement. Wittgenstein ascended directly towards Nollendorf; and two regiments of Russian hussars attacked, without waiting the arrival of the other troops, the French division of Dumonceau on the summit of the mountain, cut to pieces one battalion, made prisoners of another, and forced back the whole to Peterswaldc with the loss of above fifteen hundred men, which compelled St.-Cyr to draw back his whole corps to Gieshubel. Meanwhile Napoléon was busied with orders for the construction of a bridge over the Elbe at Pirna, and the formation of a great series of redoubts around it, to secure the passage of the army from one bank of the Elbe to the other; as also intrenchments on a large scale near Gieshubel, to bar the entrance from Bohemia in that quarter. Every thing announced a resolution to hold by the Elbe to the last extremity, and, without resuming the offensive to any considerable degree at any one point, to maintain that line as long as possible, and take advantage of any errors the enemy might commit in their operations on an immense circumference around it. During all this time, however, the troops, perched on the inhospitable summits of the Erzgehirge, were starving; the few villages which were to be met with in those elevated regions, devastated by the triple passage of armies over them, were entirely laid waste : so uni. . .

of the feux de rose which appounced the universal transport of the allied troops at the victory of Dennewitz

Anniena No sooner was Appole on informed that the Allies were again age in the threatening St -Cyr, and of the check experienced by Dumonce in, : :: hept 13

fell unexp

horse, which was defeated, and Colonel Blucher, son of the marshal, after a gallant resistance, made prisoner. On this occasion the I mperor altered his line of attack it was against the enemy's right, and ascending the course of the Elbe, that his columns were directed, in consequence, he found the roads every where passable, and the enemy were without difficulty thrown back into the Bohemian plain. There, however, they stood firm, and took a position in the level, ready to give battle. The opportunity of striking a blow with advantage had been lost great part of the allied army were now assembled, above seventy thousand strong, in the plain at the foot of the mountains Aethen, with their advanced guard, occupied a wood at the base of the hill, Wittgenstein was in Culm, Colloredo on the heights of Stricgewiez in its neighbourhood, and bleist at Siber-chen the Illussian and Prussian guards in reserve between Culm and Tophtz (2)

Fivers thing seemed to presage a decisive battle, and the soldiers he open to in both armies expected it Acvertheless, the crisis passed over * peral with nothing more than some sharp affairs of advanced guards. In truth, the generals on both sides were desirous to avoid such an extremity it was obviously for the interest of the Allies to postpone any general engagement till the arrival of Benningsen's reserve had added sixty thousand fresh troops to their arms, and Napoleon was desirous not to descend with the bulk of his forces into the Bohemian plain, both because retreat in case of disaster was difficult back again over the mountains, and because he still thought that it was on the side of Berlin or Silesia that the decisive blow was to be struck, and that some unguarded movement on the side of tho allud generals would a mallal a to laten to the last town Halal

no fixed plan, but it was not to be fo

War f Desirous, however, not to depart for Dresden without having accomplished comething worthy of his renown, and which might which the check the Albes from renewing their incursions during his absence, storsted he ordered, on the afternoon of the 17th, a partial descent into the plain and attack on the enemy's position. Teithen, who held the post at the foot of the descent, was dislodged, and driven back towards Culin by Mouton Different, and Arbesau was carried Aspoleon lumself, encouraged by the success of his advanced guard, descended to Dodnitz, at the foot of the declivity, where he eagerly reconnoitred the position and strength of the enemy. An obscure haze concealed the greater part of the hostile columns; even the chapel of Culm could not be discerned through the mist, when suddenly a terrible cannonade loudly re-echoed from the neighbouring monutains, burst forth on the right and left; numerous batteries, placed on the heights on either side, concealed by the woods and fog, sent a storm of bullets down on the advancing columns; while the Russians in front resuming the offensive, with loud shouts returned to the charge. Napoleon quickly retired to the heights, but the column which had advanced into the plain did not escape without very serious loss. Colloredo turned their left, and regained Arbesan at the point of the bayonet; Meerfeldt, on the right, moved direct from Aussig on Nollandorf, so as to threaten their retreat, while Wittgenstein and Zeithen fiercely assailed their rear. A thick fog, which prematurely brought on the darkness of night alone saved the whole division, which had descended into the plain, from total destruction; but as it was, they did not regain the mountains without the loss of an eagle, three gons, and twelve loundred prisoners, besides an equal number killed and wounded (1).

⁽¹⁾ Old 1 227 229 Ta 1,4 2.3 51 Cer.iv 107 108 Je 1.13. (*) Fort 27 *a 51 Cyr iv 169 174 Ta 11.4 the free and por committee senge and a thom he the deb selve of Betersmalle was favourable for (3) St Cyr, iv 175 175 Sand 2 179

[·] Besterday I made a terron ofstaret to anet alu

Convinced by the view he had now obtained of the positions and ravies strength of the enemy, that nothing was to be made of an attack on the side of Bohemia, and conceiving that the Allies were so situated and scattered, that they could not make any formidable attack on the French position on the mountains, at least for some days (2), Napoléon returned to Pirna, and from thence to Dresden. After a few hours' rest there, he continued his march with his goards and enirassiers across the Elbe, to check the incursions of Blucher, who, taking advantage of the Emperor's absence, was now driving Macdonald before him, and had already occupied Bantzen and extended himself along the line of the Spree. Napoléon arrived in front of the enemy, whose advanced posts were in the wood of Hartan. He immediately mounted on horseback, and a skirmisk ensued, in the course of which the village of Goldbach became the prey of the flames. That night the Emperor slept at a miserable hamlet near Hartan, with only a part of his goards around him; the greater part, unable to hear up against the incessant fatigue of so many marches and countermarches, which led to nothing, had fallen behind (5).

Returns to The utmost inclancholy prevailed at his headquarters. The camwithout et paign seemed endless; the troops, worn out by incessant fatigue and the severest privations, had lost much of their former spirit; fatigue, sickness, and the sword of the enemy, had in an extraordinary degree thinned their ranks; and the generals could not conceal from themselves, that the French army, daily hemmed in within a more contracted circle, and diminishing in numbers, was no longer able to resume the offensive with a prospect of success at any point. On the following day, the Emperor seemed, what was most unusual to him, a prey to indecision: Blucher's army was drawn up in order of battle, but he did not venture to attack him; and after remaining under arms for the whole forenoon, galloped at ten in the evening towards Neustadt, where a body of Austrians and Russians, under General Neipperg, was engaged in a skirmish with Lauriston, previous to

⁽¹⁾ Vaud.i. 179. Lond. 138. Bout. 78, 79. Odel. i. 282, 281. Fain, ii. 331.

⁽²⁾ On the morning of the 18th, when the mist had cleared away, Napoléon ascended an emirence, and long gazed through his telescope at the columns of the enemy. "All that I can see," said he to Berthier, " forms perhaps two corps of 60,000 men-they will require more than one day before they can unite and attack. Let us return to Pirna."—6412, it. 334. (3) Fain, it. 336. Odel. i. 287, 288. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 110, 1(1.

their retiring into Boliemia. Aext day feeling himself too west to resume the offensive in any direction, he returned to Dresden, and, being sensible of the necessity of contracting his circle of operations, withdrew Macdonald's army to Weissig, within two leagues of that capital, thereby in effect abandoning the whole right bank of the Fibe to the Albes (1). On the

(1) Holograph no es of Napol up on plans of the campaign at Dreulen

First Yore - Paul on oft' . Enemy

"It appears certain that the enemy's army of bilesla will move on Wittemberg and that the grand army of Torolitz will make a movement to ate left ...

corps a Russian corps, and the corps of Fulne and of Tanenzien ou bt not to be less. "There will be then upon the Lower Elbe an army of a handred and twenty thousand men . It is doubtful whether it his sot devicted a b detowards

Rambust "The army of Torpl tz-co sposed of Aestr ans of a Promiso corps and of a Press an corps connot be considered less than a hundred and tecnty thousand men. The pro ect of the Allies then will be to march two large armies, one by that ght the other by the left, and to oblige the L speror to quit Dreaden."

Second huter-Pautton of the French Army

The fourth and seventh corps under the orders of the Prince n Vo kwa are on the Lowce File

The Puke of Pages with the first corps of cavalry and their rd of safarity on Edenburg and Targen. These two arm eaform to wiler a force of eighty thousand men covering the left The Gast the fourier the the second the fifth and the eightle f rm a force of seventy thousand men cover or the rabt Ear's, the eleventh the guard on a the second men are in the centre " e court and inc second

Thent Note -If hat should be done

It will be ascerta and thus ever up if all the army of 5 less, or only a part of A les musched on Wittembers on wittenberg.

"In the one or the atter typothems one may reaste the off a tre by the right bink a dimore upon Tergan wit it in guard and the eleventh corps there to a the second and air of and thus. an pun auf a la gin glad thousand men gebourpe

from Torgan he the r gle bank on the br dgen of the caemy Alt the cirys which cover the right walker to before the emine upon threiden av sous as they sprill acchesterings amusaren ar burr pe enci give up t raden to move apon Torgon

Inother Powers

" The project will count in morag all the farres on Le in can entirely greing up Drialen " for that tiget the eleventh the guarde and the trained torpe of contains we that out I the extent fret and the fourteents wid move upon lines on

Her of tuessers was more upon these so the start and the hands we we the to best the pight was of the count, and if we receed we w Lectura to I re den

If we do not succeed in best gifter put w of the cours he are they get ont of our real we will evidently be it ged to take the fac of the Sar-

The Project

It Fartify the left wine of the eleventh come, and swait the course of events in that position of Boardon Std Outsides 1812

Other Notes on the situat on of the Arms

" It as impossible to enter winter-quarters at Bresden without a battle There are two nlans to Collons "The one to watch Dresden, and to seek an Bresden rannut be the tenire of overations it would much more numrally be at Le Dett. or at Mardeburg"

Morements on the first Plan

"If we wish to preserve Dresden it will be nocessary to set in the following manner -f secuth corps

Moramenta in the second P an.

. It will be necessary to place the day after tothe last on Altenburg and not move on firences

E ctorence of the 144 P and

...

"In the first plan, being old god to leave the second and the I in torpy, the rear at Drender, above may be reached by the encine who may more on Went of and from thence may alvance so pulctive on Legis c that that town will find the ! exposed and that the tree or which wil be left at Bresden can, by the I ghest fail he can promise ed and sail conferenate glireden le dires

"In the second plan as they may form in the end two armles which one may place in the na-tural melecia which they find the meleca, preserve the tentr I put tion, to march e ther to the a ght or

"The I arrest baring good from Dreider, the Grat and Courteenth to res the second and Lit anth may not understand the a post on and be enable to comb no their energy can and man find themselves ent off morning of that day there was a dreadful storm, accompanied with loud peals of thunder: an unusual eireumstance so late in the season, and when the chill of winter was already felt; which, combined with the state of the Emperor's fortunes, was deemed by many ominous of his fall (1).

While these indecisive but important operations were going on in Saxony and on the Bohemian frontier, a serious partizan warthe French. fare had sprung up in the rear of the French army towards Leipsic and Westphalia. Secure in their mountain stronghold of Bohemia, the allied sovereigns wisely resolved to take advantage of their great superiority in light horse, to threaten the French communications, and seize their convoys on the roads to the Rhine. With this view, Schwartzenberg advanced Klenau's corps to Freyberg, where he made four hundred prisoners; from whence Thielman, with three thousand horse, was detached to scour the country towards Leipsic, while Mensdorf, with two thousand, beset the road from Dresden and Torgau towards that city. Thielman at first had eonsiderable success. He attacked and destroyed, near Weissenfels, a large convoy of ammunition destined for the use of the grand army; made prisoners five hundred men in Merscherg, and spread alarm Sept. 18. through the whole of western Saxony. Lefebvre Desnouettes, however, now took the field with eight thousand chasseurs a cheval and cavalry of the guard, and coming up with Thielman, near Merseberg, defeated him with considerable loss, and obliged him to retire towards Zwickau, after abandoning his prisoners. This eheck, however, had no other effect than that of ealling forth Platoff, who issued from Bohemia with seven thousand Cossaeks and Austrian horse, two days after, and directing his march to Altenberg, where Lefebvre Desnouettes lay, wholly unconscious of the impending danger, attacked him with such vigour, that he was quickly driven back to Zeitz. The French general, however, was effecting his retreat by echelon in good order, while still pressed by Platoff in rear, when he was attacked by Thielman, who had rallied after his check, and totally defeated with the loss of five guns and fifteen hundred prisoners; a blow the more sensibly felt, that it fell on some of the best corps of cavalry in the French army (2).

Operations of a still more important character were undertaken Commencement of the at the same period by the army of the Prince-Royal in the north of Germany. Slowly advancing forward after his important victory at Dennewitz, Bernadotte at length moved his headquarters, a week after the battle, to Coswig, in the direction of the Elbe, and on the 15th he had got as far as Zerbst, while his vanguard was at Dessau on the Elbe. Bulow, meanwhile, laid siege to Wittenberg. The operations were pushed forward with great vigour, and on the 24th the suburbs were carried; under cover of a heavy bombardment, which set the town on fire in many different places, the second parallel was opened; and every thing announced that, if not relieved, it could not hold out for any considerable time. Ney, who commanded now only two corps, not numbering above fifty thousand combatants, (Oudinot's corps having been dissolved, and its remains incorporated with the two others since the disaster of Dennewitz,) was in no condition to raise the siege; and a movement which he made from Torgau, to even doubtful that his majesty not being present in person, it is advantageous to give battle. If we chance to lose it, the position will become such, that it will be necessary to save ourselves from the Elhe -Nonvins' Portefeuille de 1813, ii. p. 570.

⁽¹⁾ Odel. i. 287, 289. Jom. iv. 431. Tain, it. 335, 336. Bout. 83.

⁽²⁾ Lond. 141, 142. Bout. 84, 85. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 112. 🔨

clear the left bank of the Elbe of some of the allied parties who had begun to unfest it, had no other effect but to make them withdraw within the tete-depont at Dessau, which he did not feel himself in sufficient strength to attack (1)

Meanwhile Czhermeheff, with more than his wonted boldness and taken helf address, carried the partizan warfare, with the most signal success, into the heart of Westphalia. Detached with three thousand horse from the army of the north, this indefatigable leader crossed the Elbe at Desau, and pushing with great celerny across Germany, reached Cassel, the Sri 30 capital of the kingdom of Westphalia, in the end of September. Jerome, with the few troops which the necessities of the Emperor had left him for the defence of his capital, made a precipitate retreat without hring a shot, and Czhermeheff immediately made his entry into the city at the head of his Cossacks, amdst the vocierous applicate of the people, and proclumed the dissolution of the kingdom of Westphalia. Symptoms of insurrection against the French authorities were immediately manifested; the students flocked in hundreds to be enrolled in battalions of volunteers; crowds as-position which he had gained, and, after remaining in the capital a week, he was obliged, by the approach of a considerable body of French troops, to evacuate it and retire across the Elbe He regained the right bank of that river, however, as he had effected his advance, without losing a man, taking with him in triuming the stores of the arsenal, the royal horses and carriages, and an immense store of booty beneath the saddles of his Cossacks. But the moral effect of this blow far execeded these predatory gains . the brother of Nanokou had been put to flight from his capital, his dethronement pronounced and all but effected, by a foreign partizan; and a dangerous example given to the world of the facility with which these oppressive miletary thrones, destitute of all support from the interests or affections of the people, might be swept from the earth the moment the military power which unheld them was overturned. The effect, accordingly, of this stroke was soon felt through the whole north of Germany already a Saxon battahon had come over from the camp of Marshal Ney to that of the Prince-Royal, the remainder was only presented by their personal regard for their sovereign, and the energetic appeals which he made to their nultary honour, from following the example, and more than one Westphalian battalion, after the surrender of Cassel, took the first opportunity of passing over from their fugitive monarch to the ranks of German freedom (2).

Operations also of minor importance, but still of great local inserflowers at white treest, had, during the same period, taken place on the Lower Fibe.

Level in The forces there were very nearly matched. Davonst having above Impoden thirty-ome time after , but at length

Divoust issued forth on the right bank of the Ellie and moved towards lierlin. Lanenberg was early attacked by a battallon of French infantry, and a 113 the partizan corps of Inizon expelled Walmoden, whose forces were injudiciously scattered, had not thoops adequate at any one point to restrain the enemy; and the consequence was that he was compelled, though superior in numbers upon the whole, to fall back towards Grabow, leaving his right wing, composed of Swedes under Vegesack, seriously endangered. Davoust's instructions, however, were to await the result of Oudinot's advance at that period to Berlin; and he remained, therefore, inactive at Schwerin, till the defeat of Gros-Beeren having rendered the projected com
Aug. 30th. bined movement against the Prussian capital impossible, he made the best of his way back to the Elbe. In doing so, the Danes under his command separated from the French, the former retiring to Lubeck, and the latter to the lines in front of Hamburg (1).

Walmoden destroys the French di-Though this sortie of the French from Hamburg was attended with no material results, and, by leading to the dislocation of the French and Danish forces, was rather hurtful than beneficial to their ranks, yet it opened the eyes of the allied generals to the necessity of strengthening the force which observed the enemy's operations in that quarter. With this view, twenty thousand of the landwehr of Meeklenburg and Swedish Pomerania were ealled out, who did good service, by rendering disposable a much larger portion of Walmoden's regular forces than he had hitherto been able to bring into the field. The beneficial effects of this arrangement were soon eonspieuous. One of his light squadrons, which scoured the left bank of the Elbe, having intercepted a despatch from the French marshal to the governor of Magdeburg, in which he announced his intention of dispatching the division Pecheux from Hamburg to reinforce the garrison of that fortress-which was threatened with a siege after the rout of Dennewitz—the Prussian general immediately took measures to intercept and destroy it. For this purpose, leaving Vegesaek, with the Swedes and landwehr of Mecklenburg, in the environs of Schwerin to observe Davoust, he himself set out with the flower of his army, sixteen thousand strong, for Doernitz, where, with surprising eclerity, he had thrown a bridge of boats across the Elbe, and having crossed the river, came up with Peeheux, who had six thousand men and eight pieces of eannon, at the village of Goerda, near Dannenberg. There the French were speedily assailed by forces twice as numerous as their own, and totally defeated; the general and eighteen hundred men made prisoners; the whole guns and caissons taken, and twelve hundred killed and wounded; while the Allies lost only eight hundred men. Having gained this brilliant success, Walmoden instantly recrossed the Elbe to oppose Dayoust, who was greatly superior to the forces left to observe him; and with such secrecy and skill were the operations conducted, that he was back, like the Consul Nero in the war with Hannibal, before the enemy were aware of his absence (2).

Matters had now arrived at that pass with Napoléon, that a change compelled a change of position, and an alteration of his line of action, had become inchange of the scat of was by Napoleon. With equal judgment and ability, he had taken every possible advantage of the fortified line of the Elbe; and, by means of the skilful use of his bridges over that river, and his interior line of communications, he had long, with inferior forces, maintained his ground in the heart of Germany. By so doing, he had preserved his ascendancy over the states of the Rhenish confederacy longer than in any other way could have been practicable, and kept at bay forces of the Allies; by which, under any other system of operations, he would in all probability have been crushed.

But the time had now arrived when this defensive system could no longer be maintained. Rich as the agricultural productions of Saxons are, they were by this time entirely consumed by the enormous multitudes of men and horses who had so long been quartered on its territory; and the contracted circle within which, on all sides, the French armies now stood, rendered it totally impossible for any further subsistence to be extracted from the soil. while the ancreasing audacity and strength of the albed cavalry made any supply from the year to the last degree precarious. Not only had all the towns and villages around Dresden been long ago exhausted by the triple scorage of quartering, pilling, and contributions, but the forage was every where totally consumed, the stack-vards emptied, the houses burnt or in ruins, while the fields of notatoes in the rural districts, in some cases ten times turned over in search of food, told to what shifts the countless swarms of troops, of all nations, by whom they had been trodden, had been reduced (1) On the small town of Pirna, already reduced to despair by previous exactions, the crushing burden of six thousand rations a-day was imposed in the end of September, while such were the necessities or cupidity of the soldiers, when quartered in the villages between it and Dresden, that not only were the wooden crosses, erected by the mety of former ages over the places of interment, torn up and hurned for firewood, but the graves themselves were opened, the coffins broken and dragged up, the bones and corpses senttered about, the very shrouds and dead-clothes they contained, with the garlands of flowers found on once level hearts, seized by avariences hands, and sold to the miscreants who followed the army to profit by its excesses (2).

Deplorable as was the condition of the troops in the environs of conditions. Treaden, from the total ruin of the country, and the excessive preference attorns to which they were exposed, their lot was enviable comthe form pared to that of a great part of the soldiers who were necumulated be the time to the towns. The latter had warmth and lodging indeed, but they were often dearly purchased amidst the accumulated horrors of finnine, contagion, and mortality. The immones number of wounded who had been brought into the hospitals of that city since the campaign recommenced, had not only filled all the public establishments, but a great number of pratate houses, with the sick and the manuel; and allhough death had fearfully

Inguantkind In this state of wretchedness they were when the general retreat of the army from Silesia and the Bohemun fronter; in the end of September, sindlenly filled the city with thirty thousand fresh troops, besules twice as many quartered in the environs, upwards of two-thirds of whom were in a state of the most deplorable destitution. The accumulation of men and horse in a narrow spice, and consequent spread of contagion, where their prosecution of the properties of the properties of the properties of the properties of distribution, that every tenth maradict should be shot—to arrest the progress of distribution; the confusion which prevailed, the thirst for gain and enjoyment, with the continual prospect of

^{(1) *} And a yest ze of forage was to be got for the hopes. The fruiter wilders were all in runs. All the bousement but it of sic or were tent no percenture for the free of the hispones. Al the coule as him the hippers of the range of war. The english in the Celd, and but but been to timer formed over, was number of Tartars and Baschirs were to be found in its ranks, who had come from the Lake Baikal and the frontiers of China, and some of whom were armed with their primitive weapons of bows and arrows On the 50 deciber, the advanced guard, under kleuau, reached Chemnitz, where it was attacked, on a life with success, by Prince Pomatowski at the head of his gallant Poles, but the indefatigable Platoff appeared on the flank of the victors as they were pursuing their advantages, and compelled them to make a precipitate retreat to Mittwerda. Next day the headquarters were advanced to Mittmenderg a hundred thousand men had already entered the Savon plains, while a hundred and thirty thousand had crossed the Elbe, under Dlucher and Rernaldite, to energic the Prench Emperor (I)

Number of the Ville the vast armies of the Villes, acting upon an immense cirves at the ele, and directed by consummate judgment, were thus drawing the consummate suggment.

i his last abortive expedition against Blucher, he said, "I will not go out again, I will with 'and in effect he rested on his ears for ten days, constantly expenses to enough to be a few to will give him an oppor-

up Augereau with his newly

It had barely completed its military formation. Meanwhite, however, the losses sustained by the partizan warfare in his rear, and the frightful progress of finnic and discase in Dresden, Torgau, and the other fortresses on the Elbe rendered it indispensable for the French ormy to more the Emperor had no alternative but to do so, or see his army melt away and sink to the last stage of weakness before his eyes without firing a shot. The rapid march of Blucher to the Elbe, the movements of the grand army towards Kommotau and Chemmit, the passage of the Elbe by Berndotte at Rosslatt—all indicated a determination on the part of the Allies to hem him in on every side, and possibly renew on the banks of the Flbe the catastrophe of the Berezina hapoleon felt his danger, and calling St. Cyr to his cabinet at midnight on the 6th October, he thus expressed himself upon the prospects of the campaign (2) of the campaign (2)

"I am going to leave Dreeden," said he, "and I will take Van"basta" "I am going to leave Dreeden," said he, "and I will take Van"basta" amme s and your own corps with me 1 am certainly about to "basta" engage in a decisive battle if I gain it, I shall regret not having had my whole forces at my disposal to probit by it, if, on the other hand, if experience a reverse, our will be ofn o use to me in the battle, and, shut up here, you will be lost without resource. Besudes, what is Dresden now to me? It can no longer be considered as the pintot of the army, which is immalle to bind subsistence in the exhausted country which surrounds it. As little can it be considered as a great depot, for there remain in it only proryions for a few days almost all thes offers of ammunition are exhausted, and what little remains may be distributed among the soldiers. There are at Dresden twelve thousaid sick or wounded, but they will almost all the, being the remains of sixty thousand who have entered the hospital since the opening of the campaign. When winter sets in, the I for no longer af fords a position. Deing frozen, it can be passed at every point. I am about to take up another position, which is defensible at every point. I will throw back my right as far as Erfurth, support my left by Magdeburg, and my centre by the heights forming the left bank of the Saale, which form a material bulwark, at all times capable of arresting an enemy. Magdeburg will become to me another Dresden: it is a noble fortress, which can be left as long as necessary to its own resources, without the risk of seeing it carried, as Dresden might have been during the three days that the Allies were before its suburbs, if they had been commanded by a man of eapacity. Dresden can never be made a strong place without destroying the vast suburbs which at present constitute the chief part of that beautiful capital. In addition to this, it would require to be re-stored with ammunition and provisions, and it is now impossible to introduce them. In fine, I wish to change my position. Dresden is too near Bohemia: no sooner have I left it, even upon the shortest expedition, than the enemy are before its walls; and I have not the means of preventing that by threatening their rear. By the more distant position which I propose to take, I will be in a situation to direct great strokes against them, and force them to a durable peace (1)." St.-Cyr expressed his entire concurrence in these lucid and masterly opinions; and he was dismissed with the assurance that next morning he would receive the requisite formal order for the destruction of the blockhouses, palisades, and exterior fortifications of Dresden, and the evacuation of its stores upon Magdeburg.

Napoléon alters his plan, sets Cyr at Dresden.

Early next morning Napoléon set out from Dresden, and had a conference with Murat at Meissen; but, instead of then following out to join out the plan he had formed, and transmitting the instructions he Ney, and leaves St.had promised to St.-Cyr, for the evacuation of the capital, he totally altered his views, transmitted orders to that general to hold it to the last extremity, and placed under his orders his own and the remains of Vandamme's corps, about thirty thousand sabres and bayonets, besides twelve thousand sick and wounded, who encumbered the hospitals. With the bulk of his forces the Emperor marched to the northward, with the intention of joining the army of Ney in the vicinity of Torgau, and resuming his favourite project of an attack on Berlin; not without the hope that he would succeed, with his army in a central position between Bernadotte and Blueher, in separating the one of these commanders from the other, and beating them both in succession. To cover his communications, and keep in check the grand allied army, which was now fast issuing from Bohemia towards Leipsic, by Marienburg and Chemnitz, he detached Murat, with fifty thousand men, composed of the corps of Victor, Lauriston, and Poniatowski, to Freyberg, with instructions to retard the advance of the enemy as long as possible, and when he could no longer keep his ground retire towards Leipsic and the Upper Mulda (2). The imperial guard and cavalry, with Macdonald's and Marmont's corps, followed the standards of the Emperor; and, joined to the corps of Oudinot, Bertrand, and Regnier, under Ney, would form a mass of a hundred and twenty-five thousand men, with which he proposed to strike the re-over the Elbe. Then you will do what you can to preserve Leipsic, so as to give me time to beat the army of Silesia; but if you are obliged to quit Leipsic, you should direct your course to the Mulda: the bridges of Duben and Eulenharg are guarded. My intention is to pass'over to the right bank of the Elbe, and to manœuvre between Magdeburg and Dresden, debouching by one of my four places on that river to surprise the enemy."—See Johnn's Vie de Napoléon, iv. 435.

⁽¹⁾ St. Cyr, iv. 186, 188. (2) Napoleon's instructions to Murat, which explained his views at this period, were in these terms:—"I have raised the siege of Wittenberg: I have separated the corps of Sacken from that of Langeron and d'York: Augereau this evening will be at Lutzen or Leipsic, and Arrighi has orders to join him, which will bring you a reinforcement of at least 30,000 men. One of two things will hap-pen: either I will attack the enemy to-morrow and beat him, or, if he retires, I will burn the bridges doubtable blows which he meditated in the direction of Berlin. The hing of Saxony, with his family and court, left Dresden in the suite of the Emperor it was a mourtiful sight when the long train of carriages, amids the tears of the inhabitants, defiled through the streets, and the sovereign, leaving his beloved capital to the horrors of an inevitable siege, set out a suppliant or a capitre in the iron ranks of war (1).

The rapid exacuation of the right bank of the Elbe, in pursuance D ------ 1left to St of these orders for the concentration of the arms, prevented the fvr and parminded execution to the letter of the rigorous orders of Nanchon, which were "to earry off all the cattle, burn the woods, and destroy the fruit-trees " The officers entrusted with the execution of this inhuman order found various exeuses, and, in general, had not time to execute instructions which would have reduced a large part of Saxony, where they had been treated with so much hospitality, to a desert wilderness. The rapid approach of the allied armies, who covered the whole right bank of the river. and were already descending from the Bohemian hills by Pirna and Sonnenstein, threw back the numerous swarm of stragglers whom the French had left behind them Dresden was speedily invested on all sides, and numerous covered hoats, laden with crowds of sick and wounded, in the last stage of weakness and contagion, were daily arriving within its walls. Anthing could be more revolting than the conduct of the French military to these miserable wretches, when there was no longer any prospect of their being serviceable in the campaign. A soldier in the last stage of dysentery was found lying by the roadside, almost buried in a dunghill, and uttering the most piecous cries. One said in passing, "That is no business of ours," another, "I have no orders on the subject." An officer passed by, and exclaimed-" He is not to be prized-he is about to die (2) "

As soon as Napoleon was informed of the passage of the Elbe by the Prince-Royal, ite moved forward to interpose between libsaruy and interpose hater of Silesia, and, if possible, crush one or other before any assistance could be obtained. With this view he pushed on at the head of a hundred and twenty-five thousand men. The French army, being concentrated, had the fairest prospect of failing on the detached columns of libecher's army, which were marching across from the Elbe, in the direction of or a from his peritous situation. On the 9th he passed the Mulda, and by forced marches joined Bernadotte with all his forces, late on the evening of or the 10th, at 70cm/g. On the same day Napolton established his herdquarters at Duben, which Blueber had left the morning before [3]. So near was Sacken being cut off, this in following the wake of Blueber towards bubben on the evening of the 9th, he following the wake of Blueber towards by the Prench advanced guard, and only got on by filing to his right, and making a detour by the village of Sokana, where he passed the might.

i. 5~

^{(1) 1}a n. ir 366 367 Vorring Breneil de 1813; it 371, 372 Jone iv. 431 Odel if 210 211

Applican's notes on the portion of the French and the All ca, and the different plans which he had entertained for the conduct of the exampling at a critical juncture, ore very curious and instructive,

See Chap Isal, p 2621 and housers I counties 1813 is 366

⁽²⁾ Tear thul il 717, 213 Med. h. 215 (3) Rout 97 28 Jaco, 17 424 127 Vert Cong. 221 120, 121 F2 a. ll 302, 310

The Allies much to the west, and pass Napollou, who prepares to cross the Elbe and invade.

The decisive crisis was now approaching: every moment was precious; the fate of Europe hung in the balance, suspended almost even; a feather would make it incline either way. Both parties now adopted equally bold resolutions: and it was hard to say which would be first pierced to the heart in the desperate thrusts that were about to be exchanged. Each army had passed the other, and lay in great strength upon his opponent's communications; Blucher adotte at Zoerbig were between Napoléon and the Rhine, while he

Prussia. in great strength, upon his opponent's communications; Blucher and Bernadotte at Zoerbig were between Napoléon and the Rhine, while he at Duben was between them and the Elbe. Both thought that, by threatening their adversary's communications, they would draw him back or reduce him to the defensive, and both acted on this principle. On the 11th the Prince-Royal and Blucher, leaving Thumen before Wittenberg, and Tauenzein at Dossau, to guard the passage of the Elbe, instead of returning towards the Elbe, marched still further to the south-west, and established themselves at Halle and Rothenburg, directly between Napoléon and the Rhine, and in such a situation that they could open up a communication across the plain of Saxony with the grand army descending from Bohemia. Napoleon on his part, pushed forward Regnier to Wittenberg, and Ney to Dessau. The former, with the aid of the garrison of the besieged fortress, speedily raised the siege of Wittenberg, and drove Thumen, who commanded the blockading force, before him towards Rosslau; while Tauenzein, finding himself in no condition to make head against Ney at Dessau, fell back with considerable loss to the same place, and, after breaking down the bridge over the Elbc, continued his retreat by Zerbot, towards Potsdam and Berlin. Napolcon was highly elated with these advantages, and sccing the road to that capital open before him, entertained the project of earrying the war into the heart of the Prussian territory, rallying to his standard the besieged garrisons on the Oder, and establishing his winter quarters, supported by Torgau, Magdeburg, and Wittenberg, in the hitherto untouched fields of northern Germany (1).

Although, however, Napoléon did not prosecute his projected Bernadotte movement upon Berlin, and even withdrew Regnier back to Wittenberg, yet his demonstrations against that capital had the effect of withdrawing Bernadotte from his true line of operations, and endangering in the last degree the army of Silesia. On the 12th October, he detached himself from Blucher, recrossed the Saale, and moved back towards the Elbe as far as Coethen. The forces under his command, however, as Tauenzein was on the other side of that river, did not exceed fifty thousand combatants. with which he could never have hoped to stop Napoleon at the head of a hundred and twenty thousand; while the separation scriously endangered Blucher, whose communications were now entirely cut off, and who had lost a considerable part of his baggage by the operation of the French light horse on his rear. Bernadotte's true policy would have been to have continued united to Blucher, who had so gallantly made his way to him through many dangers across the Elbe; and their united force, a hundred and thirty thousand strong, might not only have bid defiance to Napoléon, but would have

⁽¹⁾ Bout. 98, 99. Napoléon to St.-Cyr, Oct. 10, 1813. Jom. iv. 436 Vict. ct Conq. xxii. 120, 121. Vaud. i. 196, 197.

Napol'on at this period wrote to St.-Cyr:-"I have raised the siege of Wittenberg; the army of Silesia is in full retreat by the left bank; to-morrow

¹ will compel it to receive battle, or abandon the bridges of Dessau and Wartenburg. 1 shall then probably pass over to the right bank with all my army; and it is by the right bank 1 will return to Diesden."—Navokon to Sr.-Car, 11th October 1813. Johns, iv. 436.

s, turned all

f -- Pow a on the fib on the direct road to entirely cut him off from the Rhine, and rendered his retreat to France or even Holland impossible (4).

Advanced Meanwhile, however, the grand allied army was not idle. Issuing ourg on the same day, ) Orderau—a central d at once to maintain eleck the advancing errg moved his headlough Murat, Poniad the Poles even rethe positions which they took up, and compence ". . . " nick towards Leansie. It was impossible that fifty thousand men could maintain their ground against a hundred and twenty thousand. The Austrians, constantly pressing forward, gained ground in every quarter, and on the might of the 9th, their advanced guard, under Prince Maurice of Lichtenstein and Thielman, surprized Weday, between Naumburg and Weissenfels, and on the direct road from Leipsic to Mayence. This movement in advance, however, which, by destroying the French communications, would have been of the very highest importance if effected by a large body of the Allies, totally failed in its effect from the insufficiency of the means omployed. Augereau, who was burrying up by forced marches to Lemsic, next morning attacked them with great vigour, and not only cleared the road. but defeated the allied advanced guard with considerable loss. On the 12th. Augereau with fifteen thousand men entered I cipsic, where a considerable concentration of troops had already taken place. On the allied right, Writgenstein continued to advance, though not without experiencing considerable resistance, and after several severe combats with Murat's cavalry The forward movement, however, of the allied right, rendered Murat's position at Orderau no longer tenable, and he was obliged to fall back along the course of the Tchoppa to Matwerda. On all sides the allied forces were approaching Lemsic, and already their advanced posts were within sight of that c.

Giulas made immself massic, where he captured $ ste, where he captured the ternards, Schwartzenberg made a reconnoissance with the corps of Kuman and Willgenstein, which led to a severe action between three thousand of almost an ine tenjunea mij

Milliaud, eighteen hundred strong, winch had just arrived from Spain (2).

⁽¹⁾ Roat 150 Vict of Cong xxii 121 125 Vanil 1 197 195 (2) Virt of Cong xxii 123 125 Hoat 103 101 Vanil 1 199 100 Norvin Eccer 2 d + 1813

^{1 350} The Incide the state of the secucion we

When Calcul Rout of Alexandre a mbeddecomp, express II is no effect energigal in it the high a light on which left at it to ag there galant levering the heavy friction reposit. One side real II we do be of the not the annexers of the highest form—bone cause, 107 to the comme of the desperate cavily contraster size requested of the II when I would be a supported to the contrast of the II with the contrast of converse almost totally duritoyed. Hersel, who have lamped with the world galantry species are sup-

Nepril 18 While the vast masses of the Allies were thus in all directions ony or the concentrating towards Leipsic, Napoléon remained inactive at Duben, waiting the concentration of his corps to carry into execution the plan which he had so long meditated, of transferring the war to the Prussian territory, and, under the protection of the strong places which he still held on the lilbe and the Oder, maintain the contest in the space hitherto unfouched between these two rivers (1). When he came to propose this hold design, however, to his marshals, he experienced an unanimous and most determined resistance. They were not equally sanguing with the Emperor as to the success of future operations; they had experienced the inability of their troops to contend with the Allies when the animating effect of his presence was no longer felt; and they not unnaturally entertained the greatest dread of plunging, with two hundred and lifty thousand men, into the north of Germany, when four hundred thousand allied troops were prepared to interpose between them and the Bline, and ent them off entirely from their communications with the French empire. Granting that they would find provisions for a considerable period in the fields of northern Prussia, and shelter from the fortresses of the libe and the Oder, of which they still retained possession, how were they to get ammunition and military stores for so vast a host in the plains of Brandenburg, or forage for their cavairy unridst the clouds of light horse by which they would speedily be enveloped? In the desperate strife in which they would be engaged, when each party throw himself upon his enemy's communications, and disregarded his own, was it not probable that two limited and fifty thousand would be crushed by four hundred and fifty thousand, and the party inferior in light horse by the one which had so great a superiority in that formidable arm? Above all, what would the Allies lose by the war being transferred into Prussia but Berlin, and the warlike resources, now nearly exhausted, of that diminutive realing -they still retained Austria, Silesia, and southern Germany, from which they could derive all their supplies; but if the French army were in exocably cut off from the Bhine, a very few weeks' warfare, such as that which had recently occurred, would exhaust all their resources; and the very magnitude of their forces would the sooner paralyse them, from the failure of all the muniments of war (2).

Notwithstanding these obvious considerations, Napoléon was strongly bent upon carrying his hold project into execution; and the four days that he spent at Duben, endeavouring to overcome the repugnance of his marshals, and revolving in his mind the probable risks and advantages of the undertaking, were among the most gloomy and painful of his life. "When the intentions of the Emperor," says Cantaincourt, "to cross the resemble, and earry the war into Prussia, became known, there was a general explosion of nurmurs in the army. 'Are we then,' said they, 'to recommence a levy of Inteklers in Prussia, and go and was on the point of being made prisoner. When the Prussian coirassiers brole those of Prance in the close of the day, he was obliged to fty, checky pursued by the enemy; and an officer who headed the pursuit, almost touching the inquarch, repeatedby called out, "Stop, stop, king!" A foithful follower of Joachim passed his sword through the pursuer's hody, and so effected the monarch's deliverance; for which he was made an esquire of the king on the spot, and next day received the decuration of the Legion of Honour from Napoleon.— Opera.

(1) "The plan of the Linperor was to have allowed the Allies to advance into the territory between the Ellic and the Sink, and then, main naring under prefertion of the form one and the magazines of Dreiden, Torgan, Wattenberg, and Hamburg, to have carried the war into the territory between the Elbe and the Oder, on which latter river, France still held blogan, Stettin, and Custrin; and, according to circumstances, to have raised the blockade of Dantzic, Zamore, and Modlin, on the Vistula. Such was the success which might have been expected was the success which might have been expected by it."—Natorios in Montholon, ii. 125.

(2) Jum. iv. 438, 439. Fain, ii. 372, 373. Las Cases, vi. 38, 40. Vict. et Çonq. xxii, 121, 122. without a counterscarp, beyond which broad boulevards, planted with trees. form a specious and shady walk for the entireus. The suburbs which stretch as in most continental cities, beyond this verdant belt, were much more considerable at that period, and they were then, as now, also shut in towards the south and east, by walls, and the gates strengthened by palisades but towards the north, on the side of the Partha, they were altogether open. To the eastward, on the road to France, the city is bounded by the marshes of the Elster and the Pleisse, which streams, flowing in a lazy current to the north-west, enclose between them swampy meadows nearly two miles broad. wholly impassable for carriages, and though the rivers are of no great breadth, they are so deep and muddy, that they are in most places unfordable cither by eavairs or infantry. This broad marsh is crossed only by the road to Lutzen and Mayence, which, after traversing the long and narrow street which leads to the barrier of Machranstadt, enters the city by the gate of Halle, over a bridge at the same place. There were no other bridges over the Fister but one or two wooden ones for foot passengers, and the stone bridge over which the creat road passes, well known from the frightful catastrophe a few days after, which has rendered it immortal in history. To the east the country consists of n beautiful plain, in the highest state of cultivation, offering a theatro worthy of the battle which was to decide the fate of the world. To the southeast, like a chain of verdure, extend the hills of Wacnie, then occurred in force by Murat's army, while to the north-east, in the direction of Mockern, the windings of the Partha, and the gentle swells and villages adjoining its banks, present a variety of obstacles to retard the advance of an approaching enemy (1)

No sooner was the arrival of the Emperor known to Murat, than Inspects the fight of his hastened to want upon him, and the two sovereigns rode out together towards the heights behind Lieberwolkwitz, from whenco the whole plain to the south-east of Leibsic can be descried. From an elevated point in that direction, near the bed of the Pleisse, Aapoleon surveyed tho whole field, and gave the necessary orders for the day following Seated by a blazing watchfire, after his usual custom, In the midst of the squares of his guard, he long and anxiously surveyed the ground, and in particular the mossy and swampy heds of the Pleisse and the Elster, which extended, in a broad belt nearly two leagues across, in the rear of the whole nosition occupied by the French army From thence he rode on to the bills of Lieberwolkwitz, from which elevated ridge, not only the positions of his own troops, but the advanced posts of the enemy, were visible. A few gun-shots only separated the two armies. The heads of the Russian and Austrian columns appeared in great strength within eannon range, but as yet all was still not a sound was heard, and no appearance of hostilities was visible. Here an linposing ceremony took place, in the distribution of engles by Napoleon to three regiments which had not hitherto received them, and he returned to I closic by the course of the Pleisse, after inspecting Ponlatowski's Poles, who oc-

cuipaed the marshy banks of that stream (2)

Frame 1. The positions occupied by the French army on the night of the positions of the Electronic Street Strik, were as follows—Bertrand's corps held I Indenau, at the constant of the Electronic Strike intrance of the Electronic Strike in order to cover thit important deflie, and keep at a distance a strong column of the enemy, which, having gamed the great road to Frintth, menaced the rear, and had already enturely cut off the communications, of the French army

To the eastward of the marshes, under the immediate command of the Emperor, three corps were stationed, facing to the southward; viz. Poniatowski's Poles on the right, on the edge of the Elster and Pleisse, between Mark-Kleberg and Connewitz; next Augereau, on the southern slope of the heights of Wachau, flanked on either side by Milliaud's cavalry; behind Wachau was placed Victor's men; from thenee to Lieberwolkwitz stretched Lauriston's corps; on their left, Maedonald's extended to Holzhausen (1); Latour-Maubourg and Sébastiani's horse stood on either flank of Victor's eorps; while the imperial guard, around Napoléon, were in reserve near Probstheyda. In all, six corps of infantry and four of horse, mustering a hundred and ten thousand men, of whom eighteen thousand were cavalry; and of these a hundred thousand were to the eastward of the Pleisse, and on the proper field of battle.

To the north-west of Leipsic, but so far removed from it as to be a separate army, a considerable force was collected to combat Blucher and the Prince-Royal of Sweden, who, in that direction, were drawing near to the city with a formidable array of troops. They consisted of Marmont's corps and two divisions of Ney's, which were posted between Mockern and Enteritch; the other division of Ney's corps, with the artillery, were on march from Duben, but had not yet taken up their ground. Arrighi's cavalry, however, three thousand strong, had come up, and Regnier's Saxons were hourly expected. The forces on the ground consisted of forty-five thousand infantry and three thousand cavalry. The whole army, already arrived or on the road from Duben, and certain to take part in the battle, amounted to a hundred and forty thousand infantry and thirty-five thousand cavalry, with seven hundred and twenty pieces of eannon, distributed in three hundred and eighty-four battalions, and three hundred and seventy-two squadrons. An immense force! equal to that with which Napoléon had conquered at Wagram, and superior to that which had fought at Borodino (2); but, great as it was, it was overmatched by the ranks of the Allies, who had now arrayed under their banners the greatest military force that modern Europe had ever seen assembled in a single field (5).

The forces of the allies were divided, like the French, into two armies; the principal of which, under Schwartzenberg, was oparm, to the south of posed to the grand army of Napoléon, while that of the north, under Bernadotte and Blucher, advanced against Ney and Marmont. They were thus arranged in the grand army for the attack of the French from the south. On their own left, opposite to the French right, and on the edge of the morass of the Elster, stood Giulay's corps of Austrians, with Lichtenstein and Thielman's light troops; the centre, opposite to Wachau, and from thence towards the Elster, was very strong, consisting of Meerfeldt and the Prince of Hesse-Homberg's Austrians, Wittgenstein's Russians, and Kleist's Prussians; while the right wing, opposed to Macdonald and Lauriston, was composed of Klenau's corps of Austrians; Ziethen's brigade of Prussians, who were at Gross Pothna, having their extreme flank covered by the Cossacks under Platoff. The reserve, consisting of the Russian and Prussian guards, and two divisions of cuirassiers, under the Grand Duke Constantine and Milaradowitch, were at Magdeborn. The great defect of this arrangement, but which no representations on the part of the Russian generals could induce Prince Schwartzenberg to alter, was, that the rivers Elster and Pleisse flowed through the middle of the allied line, separating thus the left wing from the centre, and one part of the centre from the other-a most perilous situation, if any disaster had rendered it necessary for one part of the allied line to assist the other, and which exposed the portion of it which was placed between the two rivers to imminent danger. The Austrian general even carried his infatuation so far, as to desire to place the flower of the allied army, the Russian and Prussian guards, in the narrow space between the Please and the Elster, and it was only by the determined resistance of the Emperor Alexander, that they were brought to the decisive point on the right, to the east of both these rivers. Although Benningsen's corps and Colloredo's reserves had not yet come up. the force here assembled was im mense at consisted of no less than a hundred and forty-three thousand combatants, of which twenty-five thousand were cavalry, with six bundred and twenty guns Benningsen and Colloredo's reserve, although not in time for a battle on the 16th, might be expected on the day following, and they were thirty-eight thousand more, of whom three thousand were horse, with a hundred and thirty pieces of earnon (1)

⁽¹⁾ Vict. et Conq. xxii. 127. Bout. 112. Vaud. 1. 204 Knusler, 932.

⁽²⁾ Ante, vii. 233; viii. 365.

⁽³⁾ Vaud. i. 201, 204. Vict. et Conq xxii. 127, 128. Bout, 108, 109. Lab. ii. 379. Kausler, 932. Bat. dt I eipsic, Posen, 1835, 32.

To the north of Lemsie, the disproportion was still greater. The Ye existed To the north of Lensie, the disproportion was sun greater the armies of Silesia and Bernadotte, which lay in that direction, formed to the set in all a mass of a hundred and three thousand combatants, of whom sixteen thousand were eavalry, with three hundred and ninety pieces of connon They had not all, however, come up Dernadotte, as already mentioned, but made an eccentric movement towards the Elbe, and those in line consisted only of the corps of Langeron and D'York, with Sacken in reserve. which had their headquarters at Skenditz, on the road to Halle, and they amounted to fifty-six thousand effective men, with three hundred and fiftysix guns. Thus the contending parties towards Mockern were very nearly matched on the first day, the I renell having forty-eight thousand, and the Allies fifty-six thousand men But if the contest should be prolonged for another day, and the Prince Boyal come up in time to take part in it. fortyseven thousand additional combatants would be thrown into the balance, to which the I rench reserves brought from Duben, would not oppose more than thirty thousand. Thus, upon the whole, for the final shock on which the contest would ultimately depend, the Allies could count upon two hundred and ninety thousand men, and above thirteen hundred guns, while the French could only reckon on a hundred and seventy-five thousand men, and seven hundred and twenty pieces of cannon a great disproportion, which all the advantages of Vapolcon's central position and great abilities could hardly compensate, and which demonstrated that the formidable military confederacy, of which he hail so long formed the hearl, was now fairly overmatched by the vast host which its intolerable exactions had arrayed to assert the independence of mankind (2)

Carry over

.5 000

1st Cort vof Cavalr Gereral fa out-Manhours

^{1 (1)} hau ler 231 12 d 1 202 Bont 150 121 Jem av 418 419 (2) Bout 121 hautler 931 932 Vand il 202 293 Fa 1 40a I reach Army at La pt o I git If a -1 der the command of the I rac or Kares Sufanity Cavalry $ h Corps Pr are Ponsatowsh
3 Corps V etor E DOO 15 000 4 is Corps of Cavaley Kellermann 3 000 6 da 7 so neo Corps of 9,600 & h Cotps, General Lauraton 11th Con i, Hardonald 85 Dog

Schwartrenberg's proclamation to his troops, and feetings of on both

At midnight on the night of the 15th, two rockets were sent up to a prodigious height from the headquarters of Prince Schwartzenberg, to the south of Leipsic, and were immediately answered by feetings of three, two of a blue and one of a red light, from Blucher's, on the north. These awful signals told the assembled myriads, that all things were in readiness in both armies, and that the hour of the final

2d Corps of Cavalry, General S 5th Corps of Cavalry, General M		tiaı	ıi,					Infantry, 58,000	Cavalry. 7,500 4,500 3,000
Left Wing,—Under the Co. 6th Corps, Marmont, 3d Corps, general Souham, . 7th Corps, General Regnier, . 3d Corps of Cavalry, Arrighi,			•	•	:			18,000 15,000 8,000	3,000
Be 4th Corps, General Bertrand,	hind • • •			sie	•	•		15,000
Old Guard, Mortier, Young Guard, Oudinot, Cavalry of the Guard, General	Nan	sor	ıŁy	,		:	•	4,000 26,000	4,800
	Gr	апс	1 1	ota	ıl,	٠	•	141,000	22,800 6,800

Not taken in.

The first and fourteenth Corps, at Dresden. The thirteenth Corps, at Hamburg.

-VAUDONCOURT, Campagne de 1813. p. 201.

Austrians under Schwartzenberg:

N. B .- Plotho, Kausler, and the German writers, make the French forces 140,000 infantry and 35,000 cavalry; or, in all, 175,000, which is probably nearly the truth.-Kausels. 932.

Allied Army at Leipsic.

			·
								Men.
Hesse-Homberg								20,000
Meerfeldt,								20,000
Klenau,
21. c. ii.	•	•		otal,			•	10,000	55,000
Russians .			•	оты,	•	•	•		22,000
Wittgenstein, .	•		•			•		20,000
Barelay de Tolly,								35,000
•			Ί	otal.					55,000
Prussians:
								90.000
Kleist, Ziethen,	•	•	•		•	•	•	20,000
Ziethen,	•	•	•	•		•	•	5,000
Piatow,	•	•	•					5,000
			T	'otal,					30,000
Army of Blucker:				•
Langeron,	_		_					30,000
York,	•	•	•	٠.	•	•	•	00,000 05 000
Cool -	•	•	٠		•		•	25,000
Sacken,	•	•	•	•	• •	•	٠.	15,000
			7	Cotal	, .				70,000
Corps de Ginlay,			. ,						20,000
•									20,000
Total in t	he	field	d on	the	firs	ı d	av.		230,000
						-	J ,		*00,000
	-	_

Number of the Allies who fought on the 18th.

	Army of Bohemia, Schwartzenberg, Army of Reserve, Benningsen,	•	·:			Cavalry. 29,550 5,000 10 600	Men. 158,400 28,000 56,600	Guns. 626 132 356
	Army of the North, Prince Royal of Sweden	n, .	٠	•	36,450	11,000	47,450	270
- -)	Grand Total,	•	•	•	234,300	£6,150	290,450	1,004

Lausler, p. 931.

the moment excited in the allied ranks. Now was the appointed time-now lity was the day of sible—the ho	of salvation Re st of Germany	treat to th encircled I	e enemy us ranki	witho	ut a cor lie mor	nflict wa	s impo migli

		ElocLad a	g Pe ce
	Corps at Plantz g at Za nose at Giogau at Modhn				10 12	100 300 500
			Total	1	$6	000
	Te	al Rus an Fa	rce in Ce a	any
	In the F'ell Blocked ng Lorer			•	193 56	298 000
~Protect tol 1	App 32	Grand Total of	Гозиалз		219	295
		III Pas	SSIARS
Royal Guard 1 Corps 2 Corps 3 Corp 4 Corp Corps of Wat Plockad og fo Blockad og fo	orce before I un s c	Batta 1 ma of the l we 20 24 23 11	B tra Loss of landwebr 24 16 12 69	pan es	8 23 27 27 3	drons of landwebr	Pat tecles 2 13 15 10 11 1
	Total Infantry of the Lioe Landwork Infantry Jager I fautry Pers Cavalry of the I c Landwork Cavalry Ar thery	91	121 Total	12	14 17	000 100 100 100 100	$G
		Summ	•17
	lufan ry Cavalry Ac leer				190 : 3°
-Paoreo tul 1	App 23	rand Total of			230 $	-
	IV Sweets Apr Ly	E tal	Squat. Ba	t Cas	(عمبس) ه
Sweles Lugi sh		35 4	3° 8	9 6	Heg 2	24 018 3 000
			jwede s 4 rd	Lagl L		7 013	•

Commo	on and S ren, L of the diffe ent	less es empl	r!
	Thre or 4 sts a

Corps of Tork to sof Suckec Corps of Langers to Corps of Stocker	Total		$ 600 . 11 f f $ 600	2 773 2 773 2 773	6 117 6 117	3 500 4 500 1 200 9 200
---	-------	--	------------------------------	-------------------------	----------------	----------------------------------

conflict which was to avenge the wrongs of twenty-years, and determine whether they and their children were to be freemen or slaves, was to be decided. Confidence pervaded every bosom: hope beat high in every heart: recent success, present strength, seemed the certain harhingers of victory. A sombre feeling of disquietude, on the other hand, pervaded the French army: their ancient courage was the same, their hereditary spirit was unshaken; but disaster had chilled their ardour, diminished numbers depressed their hopes, and their confidence in the star of the Emperor had been irrevocably shaken. Still they looked forward undaunted to the fight, and resolved to show themselves, under whatever fortune, worthy of the eagles which they bore. At daybreak, the following noble proclamation was issued by Prince Schwartzenberg, and read at the head of every company and squadron in his army:—"The most important epoch of this sacred war has arrived, brave warriors! Prepare for the combat. The hond which unites so many powerful

Infantry,	66,247
Chalry	13,753
Artillery,	6,117
Cossacks	9,200
Gossacks,	3,200
motel.	05 015
Total,	95,317
Cannon,	536
Anur or the North.
Not well and the Constant	5 ma 17 f mm	Carrante
	Artillery.	Cossichs.
Swedish Army,	1,703
Corps of Winzingerode, 5,465 831	583	2,211
Corps of Woronzof, 4,262 2,910	883	4,197
Corps of Walmoden,	561	1,350
Corps of Bulow,	1,800	1,200
Corps of Tauenzien,	700
Total, 112,935 22,866	6,230	3,961
Infantry,	112.936
	22,886
Artillery,	6,230
Casasia
Cossacks,	8,961
English Troops,	3,000
A 3 m3
Grand Total,	154,013
-Plorno, vol. ii., App. 62.
GRAND ARMY OF BOHTMIL.
Charles that of Don't at Bat. Squad. Batteries.	Cossick	Men.
i i	legiments.
Austrians,		130,850
Russians,
Wittgenstein, 39 36 5	4)	ro /00
Reserve and Guards,	21 }	58,420
Prassians,	,
Kleist, 41 41 14	`
C	}	48,500
Guards, $6\frac{t}{2}$ 8 2	,
Total, 245 284 872	0.5
Total, 245 284 872	25	237,770
Tofaction Co. 1	4 - 11
	Artilleiy.	Cossacks.
D	6,750
nussians, 34,600 10,900	5,750	7,200
Descries
Prussians,	2,400
Prussians,
Descries		7,200
Prussians,	2,400	7,200
Prussians,	2,400 14,900 172,200	7,200
Prussians,	2,400 14,900 172,200 43,500	7,200
Prussians,	2,400 14,900 172,200 43,500 14,900
Prussians,	2,400 14,900 172,200 43,500	7,200
Prussians,	2,400 14,900 172,200 43,500 14,900 7,200
Prussians,	2,400 14,900 172,200 43,500 14,900 7,200 237,770
Prussians,	2,400 14,900 172,200 43,500 14,900 7,200
Prussians,	2,400 14,900 172,200 43,500 14,900 7,200 237,770

nations in the most just, as the greatest of causes, is about to be yet closer drawn, and rendered indissoluble on the field of battle. Russians, Prissians, Austrans? you all combat for the same cause; you fight for the liberty of Europe—for the independence of your children—for the immortal renown of your names. All for each 'each for all! With this device, the sacred combatis about to commence. Be faithful at the decisive moment, and victory is your own? No proclamation was issued to the French army no heart-stirring words breathed the fire of hapoléon's spirit, or announced the well-known prophecy of victory (1)—an omnons circumstance, indicating in no equivocal manner that the Emperor's confidence in his fortune was at a north.

commerce Early in the morning of the 46th, hapoleon repaired to the army sent of Murat, and, from a height near I reberwolkwitz, long and analysis of Murat, and, from a height near I reberwolkwitz, long and analysis of the sent of the Poniatowski, but Lewachow, at the head of two regiments of Russian cuirassiers, boldly charged across the raying which descends from the heights of Waching to that village, and scaling the rugged banks on the opposite side, dispersed the enemy's horse, and brought back his own without sustaining any loss in the centre, however, the attack was not equally successful Prince Lugene of Wirtemberg was at first repulsed at Wachau by the heroic defence of Victor's men, while his guns were silenced by the superior fire of the French artiflery And although, hy a great effort, he at length carried the village, he was sucedily driven out again with great loss by the I rench reserves, while, on the right, blenau and Gorzakon, not having succeeded in reaching Lieberwolkwitz at the same time, successively failed in dislodging Lauriston perinapently from that important village, though it was at first carried by the Austrians under the first of these generals. Six times did the brave Russians and Austrians return to the attack of these villages, and six times were they repulsed by the invincible resolution of Lauriston's men, supported by Macdonald's corps and Schastiam's dragoons (2)

At cleven o'clock, Waedonald brought up his whole corps in an an about the corps in fank, he gained considerable success the Austrans were driven back, and a battery which they had established on the heights of the kolmberg, taken by Charpentier s division. Furouraged by this success on his left, and decuning the enemy In front of Heberwolkwitz sufficiently exhausted by three hours' continued and so ere lighting, Napo-léon, who arrived at noon on the heights behind Wachau, followed by the guards and cuirassiers, resolved to put in force his favourite measure of a grand attack on the enemy's centre. With this view, two divisions of the Young Guard, under Oudinot, were brought up and stationed close behind Waehau: two others, under Mortier, were sent to Leiberwolkwitz: Augereau was dispatched from his ground on the right centre, to support Poniatowski, who had nearly succeeded in regaining Mark-Kleberg; and behind him the Old Guard moved forward to Doelitz, so as to be in readiness to support either the right or the centre, as eircumstances might require. Finally, Drouot, with sixty guns of the guard, so well known in all Napoléon's former battles, was brought to the front of the centre; and these pieces, moving steadily forward, soon made the earth shake by their rapid and continued fire. The allied eentre was unable to resist this desperate attack: Victor and Oudinot, preceded by the terrible battery, steadily gained ground; and Napoléon, deeming the battle gained, sent word to the King of Saxony in Leipsic that he was entirely successful, and had made two thousand prisoners; and enjoined him to eause all the bells to be rung, in the city and enjoining villages, to announce his victory (1).

Schwartzenberg, finding his centre thus violently assailed, made measures to the most vigorous efforts to support it. Prince Eugène of Wirtemberg, unable to resist the shock of Victor, supported by the Old Guard and Drouot's artillery, gave ground, and was rapidly falling into confusion, when Raeffskor was brought up to support him with his invincible grenadiers. The brave Russians took post, one division behind the sheepfold of Auenhayn, and the other at Gossa; and, without once flinching before the terrible battery, kept up so incessant a fire as at length arrested the progress of the enemy. Klenau, however, attacked in front by Lauriston, and threatened in flank by Maedonald, was unable to maintain himself on the slopes of Lieberwolkwitz, and was forced back, after a desperate resistance by his eavalry, to Gross Posna and Seyfartshayn, where he at length succeeded in maintaining himself, though with great difficulty, till nightfall. Schwartzenberg, seeing his centre so nearly forced by the impetuous attack of the French guard, ordered up the Austrian reserve, under Prince Hesse Homberg, from Zobigker, where it had been stationed, in spite of the strenuous remonstranees of Alexander and Jomini, on the other side of the Pleisse, and consequently in a situation where it could not be brought to bear on the decisive point without a long delay. They were hurried as fast as possible across the river; but meanwhile, Napoléon, desirous of beating down the resistance of Raeffskoi's grenadiers, ordered up his reserve cavalry under Latour-Maubourg and Kellerman; while an attack by infantry was ordered, under Charpentier, on an old intrenchment on a hill, called the Swedish redoubt, where the bones of the warriors of the great Gustavus reposed, which had been won from the French in the early part of the day. So vehement, however, was the fire from the batteries on the summit, that the assaulting regiments paused at the foot of the hill. Napoléon hastened to the spot :-- What regiment is that?" said he to Charpentier.—"The 22d light infantry," replied the general. "That is impossible," replied Napoléon; "the 22d would never let themselves be eut down by grape-shot without taking their muskets from their shoulders." These words being repeated to the regiment, they were so stung by the reproach, that, breaking into a charge, they ran up the hill and eavairy is carried the post, which seemed to give the Emperor a decisive advantage in that part of the field of battle (1) Such was the impression produced by the reserve cavalry, that Draperate terrible arm which always formed so important an element in Napoleon's facties, that it had wellnigh decided the hattle in his fathe sentes your At one o'clock in the afternoon, hellerman, at the head of six thousand horse, debouched from Wachau, between Connewitz and Grobern, to the left of that village, supported by several squares of infantry, and advanced rapidly against the retiring columns of Prince Eugène of Wirtemberg, Lewachow, proud of his gallant achievement in the morning, threw himself. with his three regiments of Russian courassiers, in the way of the charge, but he was speedily overwhelmed, and driven back with great loss towards Gossa The consequences might have been fatal, had not Alexander, after the advice of Jomini, shortly before brought up his guards and reserves to the menaged point in the centre, where they were stationed behind the Goeselbach, while Schwartzenberg, now sensible, when it was all but too lite, of his inexplicable error in stationing the Austrian reserves in a position, between the Elster and the Pleisse, where they could be of no service, had brought up the Austrian entrassiers of the guard to the point of danger. This superb corps, consisting of six regiments cased in steel, the very flower of the Austrian army, under Count Nostitz, after crossing the Pleisse at Grobern, arrived at the menaced point at the moment, and instantly bore down with loud cheers and presistable force on the flank of kellerman's dragoons, when somewhat disordered by the rout of Lengehow's men. The effect was instantaneous the French horse were routed and driven back in great disorder to the heights behind Wachau, where, however, they reformed under cover of the powerful batteries which there protected the French centre (2)

La our him While extreme danger was thus narrowly avoided in the centre to hours s v the west of Wachau, peril still more imminent threatened the Alcha en L 31 1

Though the brave Latour Maubourg had his leg carried off by a cannon shot in the advance (5), the punderous mass advanced in admirable order under Bordesoult, broke by a charge in flink Prince Eugene of Wirtemberg's infantry, routed ten light squadrons of the Russian guard, which strove to arrest its progress, and emptured six-and-twenty guns So violent was the onset, so complete the opening made in the centre of the Allies by this terrible charge, that the French horsemen pushed on to the position where the Lapperor Alexander and king of Prosen had taken their station, and they were obliged to mount on horseback and retire a little distance to the rear, to avoid being made prisoners. But in this decisive moment Afexander was not wanting to hunself or the cause with which he was entrusted Imitating the cooluess of Napoleon on occasion of a similar crisis at the cometery of Lylan ($), he holdly advanced to the front, and ordered the red Cossacks of the guard under Orloff Dentzoff to charge the enemy's flank, while the re-

usual ect page and tang/mid. His servant a forth full damera e has beginn sery in an agony of grief as the servant has add street years and a forest page of it from your point? you we look have sere beet to be had "medisen." (1) Odel i. 33: Pool 115, 116 Jam er 4,5 ft ban il 3 T 293 Set re Conf 21 1 131 :22 serve cavalry of Burclay were also ordered up, and the last reserve batteries directed to open their fire. These dispositions, promptly taken and rapidly executed, changed the fate of the day. With resistless force, Orloff Benizoff's men, all chosen cavaliers from the burks of the Don, hore down on the flank of the French entrassiers immediately after they had captured the gans, and when their horses were blown by previous efforts; their long lances were more than a match for the cumassiers' salves; in the twinkling of an eye the whole hostile squadrons were pierced through and routed, four-and-twenty of the guns retaken, and the French cavalry driven back with immense loss to their own lines. Besuming the offensive, Baefiskoi's groundiers now attacked the sheep-farm of Anenhayn, the object already of such desperate strife, and carried it at the point of the byonet—an acquisition which, from its elevated position, again gave the Allies the advantage in that part of the field '1').

The crisis of the battle was now past; the direction of Napoleon's 19 Normattacks was clearly indicated, and Schwartzenberg load gained time to rectify his faulty dispositions, and bring up his powerful reserves from the other side of the Bleisse to the scene of danger. At three o'clock in the afternoon, the Austrian reserves came up to the front at all points: Bianchi relieved, at Mark-Kleberg, Kleist's troops, who had with great difficulty maintained themselves there against the attack of Augerean and Poniatowski; and turning the powerful batteries which they brought up against the flank of Augerean's corps, they compelled it to fall back to its original position. Dianchi followed up his advantage; he issued from Mark-Kleberg, and charged the right flank of Napoleon's centre with loud cries, and with such vigour that all around the emperor deemed the battle lost, and he himself was forced to retire some hundred paces. It immediately ordered up the battalions of the Old Guard, who stopped the head of the column; but its numerous artillery played in the most destructive manner on the flank of Victor's corps, and compelled it to fall back to the French lines. At the same time, the cannon sounded violently on the north, and repeated couriers from Marmont and Ney announced that, so far from being able to render the Emperor any further assistance, they could with difficulty maintain themselves against the importuous attacks of Blucher (2).

Sensible that, if success now escaped him, he would in vain seek to recall it on the following day, when the Prince-Royal, Benningsen, and Colloredo had brought up nearly a hundred thousand fresh troops to the enemy's standards, Napoléon resolved to make one more ellort for victory. With this view, between five and six o'clock, he re-formed his reserve cavalry behind Lieberwolkwitz: Victor and Lauriston's corps were thrown into a deep column of attack, and, preceded by a numerous array of artillery. advanced against Gossa. Such was the weight of the column, and the rapidity with which the guns were discharged, that Gorzakow's corps was broken, and Gossa taken; but in this extremity Schartzenberg brought up the Prussian division of Pirsch, which regained the village, and drove back the column to a considerable distance; while a powerful Russian battery of eighty pieces of the guard, by the precision and rapidity of their fire, arrested the progress of the enemy in that quarter. Excessive fatigue prevented either party from making any further efforts in the centre and left, and the battle there was reduced to a furious cannonade, which continued without intermission till night overspread the scene (5).

die,

⁽¹⁾ Bout. 116, 118. Vand. i. 207. Jonn. iv. 457, 458: Pain, ii. 399.

⁽²⁾ Bout, 118. Vaed, i. 208. Jour, i ii. 401. Odel, ii. (3) Vict, et Conq. xxii. 133,

Meerfeldt soon after came up, having been long retarded in his Lest state: Meerfeldt soon after came up, narring second to Fister, by of Meerfeldt march across the swamps between the Pleisse and the Fister, by which is the almost impracticable nature of the ground. Late in the evenpr soner ing. however, he succeeded in crossing the latter stream by the ford of Dochtz, and was advancing at the head of the leading hattalion to attack the I reach right flank near Mark-Aleberg, when he was suddenly assailed by a division of the Old Guard in front, and Populatowski's Poles in flank, and driven back with great loss into the river. Meerfeldt himself was made nrisoner, with a whole hattalian, and immediately brought into the Emperor's presence, and although the repulse of his corps was of no material consequence to the issue of the day, it threw a ray of glory over this well deliated field of carnage (4)

Operations On the other side of the Elster, Ginlay was engaged the whole day, Liedeness With various success, against Bertrand's corps Though far removed from the headquarters of either army, and separated by five miles of marshes from the great body of the combatants, the struggle there was one of life and death to the French army, for Bertrand fought for Lindenau, and their only line of retreat to the Rhine in case of disaster! The Austrians were at first successful, though not without a desperate struggle. After seven hours' hard fighting, their gullant corps overcame the stubborn resistance of the French, and Bertrand was not only driven out of Lindenau into the marshes, but forced to take refuce behind the Lappe, where his troops, drawn up in several squares, maintained the contest only by a loose fire of trailleurs if Giulay had, as soon as he got possession of the town, broken the bridges of Landenau, the retreat of the French army would have been entirely cut off, and their communications with the Rhine rendered impossible. Seriously alarmed at the prospect of such a disaster. Napoléon sent positivo orders to Bertrand to regun that important post at all hazards, coupled with severe remarks upon his having ever lost it Stung to the muck by these reproaches, Bertrand immediately re-formed his troops into columns of attack, and falling suddenly on the Austrians, who, deeming the contest over, were off their guard, drove them out of Sindenau, and reonened the communications of the grand army Giulay, upon this, drew off his troops to the ground they had occupied at the commencement of the action (2)

Battle of place, less important from the number of forces engaged, but not To the north of I capsic, on the side of Mockern, a conflict took by Radefeldt, and Breitenfeldt, and D'York by I indential on Mockern, Sacken formed the reserve. Before they reached the enemy, however, who was posted near Skenditz, the action had begun on the south of Leipsic, and Aer, who had the command, was so impressed with the awful cannonade which was heard in that direction, that he dispatched two divisions of Oudinot's corps, now under the command of Souham, towards Wachan, to reinforce the I mperor. The effects of this generous real were in the highest degree disastrous to the French arms. The other divisions of Southam's corps having not yet come up from Duben, the French marshal had not at his disposal, after this large deduction, above twenty-five thousand horse; while Blucher had fifty-six thousand. Ney drew up his troops in a strong position, the right in front of a wood of some extent in the neighbourhood of Breitenfeldt; the line extending from thence through Gross Wetteritz to Mockern on the left. Advanced posts also occupied Radefeldt and other villages in front. Langeron was directed to expel the enemy from Radefeldt; and pushing on, to force Breitenfeldt, and drive him into the open plain beyond, towards Leipsic; while D'York, on the French left, following the great road to Leipsic, was to turn to its left at Lutschen, and drive the enemy from Lindenthal (1).

⁽²⁾ Seet et Cone exil 131 Beut 129 Fal 339 Jon ir 439, 439. kander 918 407 Lab. 65 317. 348 401

⁽¹⁾ Lout. 217 120. Jons iv. (50 Vert et Comp

At the first onset, Ney, finding himself assailed by such superior forces, ahandoned Radefeldt and the villages in front, and drew in his advanced posts over a considerable space to the main line running from Lindenthal to Mockern. There, however, notwithstanding his great inferiority of force, he stood firm, and a most obstinate conflict ensued. The wood on their right, and the villages of Gross and Klein Wetteritz, furiously assailed by Langeron, were as hravely defended by Ney; but, after being three times taken and retaken, finally remained in the possession of the Allies. D'York at the same time commenced a vigorous attack on Mockern, on the extreme French right; while the Russian horse charged with the utmost gallantry the French batteries and squares in the open plain between the villages. After a most sanguinary conflict, in the course of which it was five times taken and retaken, Mockern was earried by D'York; and Marmont's eorps, driven back to the open plain in the direction of the Partha, soon fell into disorder, and lost a considerable part of its artillery under the repeated eharges of the Russian and Prussian cavalry. The whole French line was falling into confusion before Sacken eame up with the Russian reserve; so that he was not required to take part in the action. Late in the evening, Delmas' division of Ney's corps arrived from Duben, and was immediately hurried forward to the right, to eover the retreat of the park of Ney's corps, which was in the most imminent danger of falling into the hands of the victorious Russians: but, though this ealamity was averted by the good countenance which that body showed, yet it was too late to retrieve the day, and the shattered remains of Ney's army retired behind the Partha, having lost an eagle, two standards, twenty guns, and two thousand prisoners, besides four thousand killed and wounded, in this well-fought field. In addition, thirty cannon were surprised by the Cossacks on the night following; where the French, though defeated by superior numbers, displayed the most heroic courage and devotion (2).

Result of the battle of the 46th, though it terminated decisively in favour fishing. of the Allies only on the side of the Partha, yet was, in its final results, entirely to their advantage. Situated as Napoléon was, an indecisive action was equivalent to a defeat: his affairs were in such a situation, that nothing could retrieve them hut a decisive victory. Under Napoléon in person the French might hoast with reason of having had the advantage, since the Allies who made the attack, had been unable, excepting at Mark-Kleherg, to force them from their position; and the loss, which was upwards of lifteen thousand on each side, was pretty nearly halanced. But the defeat at Mockern threatened his rear: the frightful peril incurred at Lindenau, had shown the hazard in which his communications were placed. The enemy on the succeeding day would receive reinforcements to the amount of nearly a hundred thousand men, while he could not draw to his standards above thirty-five thousand, and his position, separated from his reserve park of ammunition.

49

⁽¹⁾ Lond. 155, 156. Bout. 121, 1221 Vict. et . (2) Lond. 155, 159. Bout. 121, 122. Jom. iv. Conq. xxii. 134, 135. Fain, ii. 406,

and be could, by holding Lemsic as a tete-de-pont, gain time for his immense. army to defile over the perifous pass in its rear. But Napoleon could not brook the idea of returns from an open field, in which he himself had commanded. His position, as the head of a revolutionized military state, forbade it He had appounced to the king of Saxons, that he had been victorious. all the hells in and around I ensue had been set a-ringing to celebrate his triumph of he now retreated, it would be to announce to all Europe that he had been defeated. Actuated by these feelings, as well as by a lingering confidence in his good fortune, and in the likelihood of the allied generals falling into some error which might give him the means of striking a dicisive blow from his central position, he resolved to remain firm, and not only made no preparations for a retreat, but give no directions for throwing any additional bridges over the Elster and Pleisse in his rear, though the engineers could have established (wenty in a single night (1)

No sooner had the fire ceased than Napolcon ordered Meerfeldt to with New bo brought into his presence. He hailed with the utmost eigerness Ille whom the opportunity of reopening by means of the Austrian general, with whom he was well acquainted, diplomatic relations, which he hoped unglit become separate and confidential, with the Emperor postile. Francis and the cabinet of Vienna Having partialen of the frugal supper which the bivouse would afford even for the imperial table. Meerfeldt was at ten of night introduced into the Imperor's cabinel. By a singular coincidence, it was he who had come a suppliant on the part of the Emperor of Germany to solicil the armistice of Leoben , it was he who had conducted, on the part of the cubinet of Vienna, the treaty of Cumpo-bormio, and il was from his hand, on the night following the battle of Austerhiz, that the neucli note had come, which gave the first opening to the conferences which led lo the peace of Presburg. The mutations of fortune had now brought the same general to the Emperor's tent, when the latter in his turn had become the suppliant, and he was to solicit, not to concede, peace and salvation from his former imperial opponents. He addressed to him some obliging expressions on the inisfortime which he had sustained in being made prisoner, and dismissed him in the Austrian headquarters, stored with every imaginable argiment that could be ur en against continuing in the Russian alliance; and offered, on condition of an armistice being immediately concluded, to exaquate formany, and retire beligned the Rhine till the conclusion of a general peace (2). 'Adicu, general,' and he, when he dismissed Meerfeldt on his events of to mornor. They become themselves in remark to not dipositions a lack with aging to repose an the aliadow of poster and in dream of the happiness of France, after has up drawn of sie parole: "when on my behalf you shall speak of an armistice to the two emperors, I doubt not the voice which strikes their ears will be eloquent indeed in recollections (1)".

⁽¹⁾ Boat, 1.2 (2) bet et Company 221 Bogo t tit de la Comre 5 i Jonns 4 2 (4) etter political and title et al. (2) etter political and etter p in the reid of a fifter in tim. It is to him to half accept coasts appeal for a title pass above You red on they adult in I of a limit self. I have your calculate there me at the case-opening of much exception to flattate we to a speed by also a placed on a superior of the case of it may perhaps be too late, for who can foretell the

Napoléon's sense of the dangers of his situation was sufficiently night at Napolčou's evinced by his offering to retire from Germany on condition that an armistice was agreed to. He passed a melaneholy night after Meerfeldt had departed, his tents being placed in the bottom of a dried fish pond, not far from the road which leads to Roellitz, where they were pitched in the middle of the squares of the Old Guard. The cannon continued to boom occasionally on the side of Mark-Kleberg through the whole night, where the advanced posts were almost touching each other. The most sombre presentiments filled the minds of the generals who attended on the Emperor: ammunition was already becoming scarce, and no fresh supplies could be obtained; a few potatoes found in the fields were all the provisions the men could obtain in the country, and the stores in Leipsic would soon be exhausted: certain ruin appeared to await them, when the army, which had not been able to discomfit the enemy to whom they had been opposed, was assailed in addition by a hundred thousand fresh troops, who would come up on the succeeding day. Still the Emperor, though fully aware of his danger, made no preparations to guard against it; not a carriage was directed to the rear, not a lbridge was thrown over the Elster (2); but relying on the valour of his soldiers, his own good fortune, and the strength of Leipsic as a point d'appui to his centre, the mighty conqueror remained in moody obstinacy to await the stroke of fate.

The allied sovereigns were too well aware of the advantages of The Allies their situation either to fall into the snare which Napoléon had laid defer the for them, by sending back Meerfeldt with proposals for an armistice, or to throw them away by precipitating the attack before their whole forces had come up. Under pretence, therefore, of referring the proposals to the Emperor of Austria, Schwartzenberg eluded them altogether; and no answer was returned to them till after the French had recrossed the Rhine. Meanwhile, the great reinforcements on which they relied were approaching. Bernadotte, on the 16th, had reached Landsberg, on his way back from the Elbe, to which he had been drawn by Napoléon's demonstrations against Berlin: Benningsen was at Coelitz, and Colloredo at Borna; so that all three might be expected to take part in the action in the evening of the following day. The attack, accordingly, was ordered at two o'clock in the afternoon of that day; but such was the badness of the roads to the southward, from the immense multitude of artillery and chariots which had passed over them, that Colloredo and Benningsen had not then come up, and did not reach their ground, the former till four; the latter till late in the evening. The attack was, therefore, adjourned till the following morning, when the troops were ordered to be in readiness by daybreak; and no doubt was entertained of success, as the grand allied army would then be reinforced by above fifty thousand combatants, besides those who joined Blucher and Bernadotte (5).

But, although matters were thus favourable to the Allies on the ground where Napolćon and the allied sovereigns commanded in affairs to person, to the south of Leipsic, affairs were far from being in an equally satisfactory state to the north of that town, where Blucher that will be able to arrest on the Vistula the inundation of a people half nomad, essentially conquer-ing, and whose dominions extend from this to China."—Fair, ii. 412, 413.

⁽¹⁾ Fain, ii. 412, 414. Odel. ii. 23. (2) Odel, ii. 23, 25. Jom. iv. 463. Rogniat, Art. dela Guerre, 393, 394.

⁽³⁾ Bout. 125, 126. Jom. iv. 464, 465.

992

was opposed to Nev and Marmont. Reguer, and the other divisions of Nev's corns, bad now come up from Duben, which rendered him more than a match for the army of Silesia, weakened as that noble host was by six thousand men lost on the preceding day, and the incessant fighting which it had sustained since the commencement of the campaign. A violent cavalry action on the 17th, between Arright's dragoons and Wassichikoff's Cossacks, on the banks of the Partha, had only terminated to the advantage of the Albes by bringing up the reserve linesars, who at length drove the enemy back to the very walls of Jensie Every thing, therefore, on that side depended upon bringing the Prince-Royal into action; but in that quarter a most alarming degree of backwardness had become visible, which threatened the cause of the Allies with the most serious consequences. Not only had Bernadotte, in pursuance of his usual system of saving the Swedes, so sucressfully applied at Gross Becren and Dennewitz, arranged the troops of his own dominions a full march in the rear of the Russians and Prussians, but instead of directing them to Halle, as he was recommended, where they would have been, if not in line with Blucher, at least not very far in his rear, he had moved the Russians only to Zoerbig, while the Prussians and Swedes stretched by the Peterberg and Grobzig, so far from the decisive point as to be of no service whatever in the crisis which was approaching (1)

l ortunately for the Albes and the cause of European freedom. their interests were at this inneture supported, at the headquarters of the Prince-Royal of Sweden, by men whose discernment influence with his royal lighness, for the former had the disbursement of the British subsidies, and the latter was the accredited diplomatist and personal fivourite of Alexander. Indefatigable were the efforts which these ardent men made at this crisis to overcome the backwardness of the Prince-Royal, and bring forward his powerful force, lifty thousand strong, to the support of Blucher, who was always in the front, and mught be exposed from that cause, if not adequately backed, to the most serious danger. Not only did Sir Charles personally remonstrate, in the most energetic manner, on the 14th and 15th, against the permesons and eccentric direction which Bernadotte was giving to his troops, and which had the effect of excluding them from all share in the action of the 16th; but on the morning of that illy be addressed to him a written remonstrance, penned with respect but inditory frankness, and breatlung a warm but not undeserved spirit of patriotic indignation (2) These efforts, which were vigorously seconded by Blucher and

⁽¹⁾ Lond 160 161 Ner et Con (xx 1 130 2) Three letters are very curums and con dur ng mommments both a f the fortunes policy at the er second of la 1 s r perm I me to observe that The kigh k art on has

Chartes galloped to his bradquarters, and foun e cale at land lorg sete France murch delived the Ressaue, and the London a more boll and the from one, He could not alasks no lute warm with the Prince-Royal e but got from General

earmy a force are in

Pozzo di Borgo, at length produced the desired effect; the circuitous sweep, indeed, which Bernadotte had given to his troops, saved Ney from destruction, and doubled Blucher's losses on the 16th; but at length he was brought forward to his ground. On the night of the 16th; Bernadotte slept at Landsberg, and on the evening of the 17th he was on the heights of Breitenfeldt, immediately in the rear of Blucher's army. His conduct on this occasion, as on many others during the campaign, was not owing either to want of military discernment or physical resolution, but to secret views of political ambition. He clearly foresaw and anxiously desired the fall of Napoléon; but he had no wish to have a hand in completing either his destruction or that of his army; being repelled as much by a natural feeling of patriotic attachment to the land of his birth, as by a conviction that such a catastrophe would prove an insurmountable bar to his own ascent of the vacant throne on which he had already set his heart (1).

Considerable changes, during the night of the 17th, were made by Napolcon in the disposition of his troops. At two in the morning, position during the seeing that no answer had been returned to the propositions lie had sent through Meerfeldt, he prepared for battle, and made the requisite contraction of the circle which his troops occupied, to enable them to withstand the prodigions force by which they were to be assailed. He had now brought up his whole reserves from Duben; and Regnier with his Saxons, now reduced to eight thousand men, had joined the standards of Ney on the Partha. The whole army effected a change of front to the left, the left wing being thrown back, and Connewitz, on the extreme right, serving as the pivot. Poniatowski remained fixed there, on the edge of the Elster; and the whole army, now not numbering more than a hundred and sixty thousand combatants, was arranged in a semicircle, facing ontwards from that point to the extreme left, which rested on the Partha to the north of Leipsic. The line, thus contracted, abandoned Wachau, Lieberwolkwitz, and the heights in their rear, the object of such fierce contention on the preceding day; it ran from Connewitz to Probstheyda, in which last village Victor was stationed. Macdonald fell back to Holzhausen: Lauriston at Stoeteritz was a reserve to the two latter corps; while the imperial guard, under Napoléon in person on the Thonberg, near the Tabacco-windmill, still occupied a central position, from which he could succour any point that might be peculiarly menaced. Bertrand remained in his old position at Lindenan, and detachments in observation merely occupied the villages to the westward of Tweinain'sdorf and Moelkau, round to Ney's army, which was in position immediately to the north of Leipsic on the Partha; Regnier at Paunsdorf, opposite Taucha; Ney at Santa Thecia; and Oudinot at Neutsch. Uneasy about his retreat, Napoléon repaired at three in the morning to Lindenau, where he had a confe-

Adlercrentz a promise to send forward 3,000 horse next morning. Sir Charles then returned in Blucher, took part in the action, and after it was over rade back to Halle, where Bernadotte had still not arrived, and wrote to him the following laconic epistle—"Halle, 9 r v , 16th Oct.,—I have just come from General Blucher's field of battle. I have the honour to lay before your Royal Highness the details of the action. I venture to supplicate your Royal Highness to march the moment you receive this letter on Taucha. There is not an instant to lose; your Royal Highness has pledged your word to me to do so. I must now address you as a friend. I speak now as a soldier; and, if you do not commence your march, you will repent it as long as you like." To a soldier and a gentleman this was sufficient, and Bernadotte at length moved next morning, and rence with Bertrand who received orders to push forword an advanced guard and occupy Wiessenfels, on the road to Mayence which was done before noon on the same day. The position of the French army around Leipsic, with its flanks secured from being turned by the Elster and the Partha, and the old walls of the town itself as a great redoubt in its centre, was undoubtedly strong; and hardly hable, if bravely defended by such a force as Napoléon's, to be forced by any masses of assallants, how great soever. But it had a frightful defect, that it had but one issue for so vast a multitude of men, horse, cannon, and chariots in rear: resembling thus, in a striking minner, the position of the Russians, with the Alle at their backs, in front of Friedland (1), of which Napoleon had taken such decisive advantage in the first Polishwar (2).

Dispos tions of Pr ce

the state's returned. The grand army of Bohemia, and Benningson's reserve

r igsen's Prus-

under Barclay de Tolly, who had the corps of kleist and Wittgenstein under his command, with the grenadiers and guards in reserve, assembled near Gossa, and was to advance straight upon Wachau: while the left, under the direction of the Prince of Hesse-Homberg, consisting of Meerfeldt's and Colloredo's Austrians, his own reserve, and Lichtenstein's men, was to move forward by the edge of the Elster, from Connewitz and Mark-Kleberg, on Dochtz and Lensie To the north of I cipsic, also, the Prince-Royal and Blucher, now nearly a hundred thousand strong, had made their orrangements for a decisive engagement the former, with the corps of Langeron, as well as his own troops, under his orders, was to cross the Partha, turn Ney's right, and force him back upon I cipsic, from the side of Toucha, and the road to Wittenberg; while Blucker, with his two remaining corns of Sacken and D'York, was to remain on the right bank of the Partha, and drive all before him who should remain on that side of the river. The forces of the Allies were more numerous than had ever been assembled an one field during modern times, for they mustered two landred and eighty thousand combatants, with nearly fourteen hundred guns (3), and in intrinsic strength and mintary equipment, far exceeded any force ever collected for narlike nurnoses since the beginning of the world (1)

At length the battle of grants commenced. The 18th October of dawned, and the 1st lour of the French Impire began to toll-branch at mine, Appleton took his station on the Thomberg: the enconstant my's columns were already approaching with rapid strides on all sides, and their heads were soon seen surmounting the hills of Workau, onld driving, like chaff before the wind, the I rench detachments which were stationed to retard their advance in the intermediate villages, hiespressibly wish was the spectacle which their advance afforded to the agitated multitude who througed the steeples of Leipsic. As far os the eye could reach,

⁽¹⁾ for vl. 125 (2) Post 123 122 Jon ir 455.472. Vet at Con; sxii 137.135 Vaul I 218 212 (3) Lost 123 131 Jon ir 455 157 Vaul I 212 213 Kaule 915 191 (4) Mardeners at Pittar is said to have hal 300 000 mra, and the turn, when they libehald

Crarr in his lass round alone had 210 0.01 but making of those arm on could have day a vog rises in the no their direct of vest of deep on the large attention with the host which fought moder the all of bonners at he pice, which was 230 000, with 1334 pices of CRECON.

the ground was covered with an immunerable multitude of men and horses; long deep masses marked the march of the infantry; dazzling lines of light indicated the squadrons of cavalry; the glancing of the bayonets in the rays of the sun, sparkled like crests of foam on a troubled ocean; while a confused marmar, arising from the neighing of horses, the march of the columns, and rolling of the guns, was heard like the roar of a distant cataract. The allied left, under the Prince of Hesse-Homberg, first came into action, and its success was brilliant and immediate; the tesistance of the Poles on the banks of the Elster, under the brave Poniatowski, proud of the rank of marshal of France, worthily conferred on him the day before by the Emperor, was indeed heroic, but they were muchle to withstand the superior numbers and vehement attacks of the Austrians, under Bianchi and Cultoredo, and gave ground. The danger on that side was soon innuinent; for the victorious Austrians, driving the Poles before them, soon passed Doelitz and Locssniz, and menaced Connewitz and the submbs of Leipsic—the only line of retreat to the army. Napoleon immediately repaired to the spot with two divisions of the Young Guard, under Ondinot, while the Old, under Mortier, was stationed in the rear, in the suburbs of Leipsic: the steady counterance of these veterans restored the combat; Prince Rese-Homberg was wounded; and though the Poles were driven back, after hard fighting, to Connewitz, the action on this side reased to be alarming, and all Bianchi's efforts could not disludge Poniatowski from that village, even with the aid of Giulay's corps, which Schwartzenberg dispatched to his support (1).

The village of Probstheyda formed the salient angle of the position occupied by the French around Leipsic, and as such it became, early in the day, the object of the most vehement contention between the opposite parties. In the first instance, the progress of the Allies in the centre was rapid: Lieberwollowitz and Wachen, the scenes of such bloody struggles on the 16th, were abandoned after a slight combat of advanced posts; the allied artillery were hurried forward annuist lond shouts to the summit of the hills of Wachan, and soon two hundred pieces of cannon, arraved along the heights, began to send an iron tempest into the French columns. But meanwhile Napoléon's batteries were not idle; sensible of the inferiority of their pieces in point of number to those of the enemy, the men endeavoured to supply the deficiency by the rapidity of their fire, and their gams were worked with extraordinary vigour. Every cannon that could be brought to bear on either side was hurried to the front; and soon eight humdred pieces of artillery discharged their fire, or played on the hastile masses, in a space of not more than half a leagne in breadth in the centre of the army. In the midst of this tremendons fire, Prince Augustus of Prussia, and General Pirsch received orders, with Kleist's corps, to carry Probstheyda. Swiftly they move over the intervening open spare, and entered the village with such vigour, that they reached its centre before the onset could be arrested; but there they were met by Victor and Lauriston, at the head of dense masses, who combated with such resolution that they were driven back (2).

Second attack on Probatics of the Probatics of the Village, and again rushed into the village, followed by Vittgenstein's Russians and nearly the whole of Kleist's corps. Such was the vehemence of their onset, that the French were entirely expelled, the fugitives and wounded overspread the plain, which extended towards Leibsic Imposing masses at the same time displayed themselves towards Holzhausen, on the French left, and the centre seemed on the point of being forced. Appoleon instantly hastened to the snot with the remaining two divisions of the Young Guard the steady columns made their way through the crowd of furnitives who were leaving the rear of the centre and blocked up all the roads. Amidst the clouds of dust which obscured the view, and the cries of the combatants, which drowned even the roar of the artillery, he preserved his usual calmness and decision, and pushing forward to the front, arrested the tumult with two battalions of the guard, and did not return to his station beside the windmill till be had entirely expelled the enemy from the vellage. Again the Russians under Wittgenstein, and Benningsen's reserves were brought up to the attack, and dislodged the I reach but a third time the invincible soldiers of Lauriston and Victor recovered their post, and hurled back the assailants, with dreadful loss into the albed ranks (1)

⁽¹⁾ Fain, ii. 418, 120. Bout. 130, 131. Vand. i. (2) Pain, ii. 420, 412. Bout. 131, 132. Jom, iv. 211. Jom, iv. 470. 470, 471, Vand. i. oct. 965.

On the right, Ziethen's Prossions marched against Holzhausen and 1 el e sht Zuckelbausen, at eleven o'elock in the forenoon, followed by a considerable part of Benningsen's Russians in reserve. In moving up they were charged in flank by Schastiani's dragoons, but Pahlen's and Tschaolitz emrassiers speedly repulsed the charge, and drove back the enemy's horse with great loss into their own lines. At the same time, Platoff, with six thousand Cossacks, by a circuitous sweep turned the extreme left of the French on this side, and threatened the rear of Macdonald's corps lie in consequence. abandoned Holzhausen, and fell back to Stocteritz, warmly pursued by the victorious Prussians, and the allied sovereigns, who had now advanced their headquarters to the sheepfold of Mensdorf, ordered an attack on that village Such, however, was the vehemence of the fire of the French batteries of a limited guns posted on either side of Probatheyda-which, seeing their rear thus threatened, wheeled about, and opened with terrible excention on the flank of the attacking column—that, after having all but carried the villace, it was forced to recoil, glad to seek shelter in the nearest hollows from the fearful tempest. Still further to the albed right, Bubna's hight borse, with o body of Platoff's Cossacks, pushed across the plan beyond the reach of the combitants, and opened up o communication with Bernidotte's outposts.

fatherland (2)

The Allies Menw 14 10

Schwartzenberg, finding that the resistance of the enemy to the south of Leipsie was so obstinate, and that the assault of the villages be maded was attended with such a fearful loss of life, and having received comb and information of decisive success to the north, which would soon render the enemy's position untenable, ordered his columns over the whole semicircle to the south, to seek refuge in the nearest hollows from the dreadful effect of the enemy . batteries, and for the remainder of the day confined his attack on that side to another and more powerful arm. The whole cannon of the grand army, amounting to above eight hundred pieces, were brought forward to the front, arranged in the form of a vast semicircle two leagues in length, from Loesnitz by the ridges of Wachau towards floizhauzen, and during the remainder of the day they kept up an incessant and most destructive fire on the enemy's columns. The French batteries in that direction, which numbered above five hundred pieces; answered with unconquerable vigour; but independent of their inferiority in point of number, the position which the allied guns occupied was far superior, being stationed in great part on the heights commanding the whole plain, which the enemy had occupied on the preceding day, while their semicircular position caused their concentric fire to fall with redoubled severity on the dense and close masses of the French, the fire of whose batteries, on the other hand, spreading like a ffan towards a wide circumference, was attended, comparatively speaking, with very little effect. Galled beyond endurance by the frightful discharge, Lauriston and Vietor's men repeatedly, and almost involuntarily, rushed out of Probstheyda, and advanced with heroic resolution against the hostile batterics; but, as soon as they came within the range of grape-shot, the heads of the densest columns were swept away, and the broken remains recoiled, horror-struck, behind the shelter of the houses. For four mortal hours this awful seene lasted till nightfall; the allied batteries continuing, like a girdle of flame, their dreadful fire, while the French masses, devoted to death, still closed their ranks as they wasted away, but with unconquerable resolution maintained their ground. Close to Napoléon himself twelve guns were dismounted in a few minutes; from the ranks which immediately surrounded him, some thousand wounded were carried back to Leipsic. In Probstheyda, Vial, Rochambeau, and several generals of inferior note, were killed, and great numbers wounded during this dreadful interval; but still their columns stood firm beneath the tempest, exhibiting a sublime example of luman valour rising superior to all the storms of fate (1).

While this terrible conflict was going on to the south of Leipsic, and Berns. Ney and Marmont had to maintain their ground against still more overwhelming odds on the banks of the Partha. At ten in the morning, Blueher, in pursuance of the plan agreed on, crossed that river, and marched to join the Prince-Royal, who, on his part, broke up at eight from Brietenfeldt, and passed at Taueha and Mockau. Their united force, when they were both assembled, was little short of nincty thousand combatants, exceeding by fully forty thousand men the force which Ney could oppose to them: and they moved direct upon Lcipsic by the right bank of the river. The French general, finding himself thus outnumbered, adopted the same ehange of front which Napoléon had followed to the south of Leipsie, and drawing back his men to Schoenfeld, Sellerhausen, and Stuntz, extended across to Regnicr's corps, which was established at Paunsdorf. Thus the whole French army was now arranged in a circle around the city, having its right, under Poniatowski, resting on the Pleisse at Connewitz, and the extreme left, under Marmont, at the confluence of the Partha and Elster, below the gate of Rosenthal (2).

Defection of the Saxons, and report, and depressed the French as much as it clated the Allies. A french centreat of the brigade of Saxon cavalry, as soon as the Russians approached the heights of Heiter Bleik, where it was stationed, instead of resisting the north of Leipsic. passed over to the allied ranks. This example was speedily followed by two Saxon brigades of foot, with their whole artillery, consisting of twenty-two pieces; and the Wirtemberg horse of Normann, as already noticed, imme-

⁽¹⁾ Fain, ii. 428, 429. Odel, ii. 30, 31. Vaud. i. (2) Kausler, 950. Bout. 135. Viet. et Cong. Anii. 215. Bout. 133, 134.

dualety after also went over to the enemy. This unparalleled event caused great consternation, as well it might, in Reguer's corps; for not only were they weakened, when already inferior in force, by full eight thousand men, but such was the exasperation of the Saxon cannoniers, that they pointed their guns, immediately after going over, against the French lines, and tore in pieces the ranks of their former comrades by a point-blank chackinge. The French general, reduced to the single division burutte, and direatened on the right by Bubna from the Bohemian army, and on the left by Bulow from that of the Prince-Bojal, was immediately compelled to full lack to Sellerhausen, almost close to Leipsie. Aey, informed of the catastrophe, histened to reinforce Regimer by Delmas' division of his own corps, while Barmont, to keep abreast of the retrograde movement in other points, withdrew his froots in a similar degree, with the exception of his extreme left, which stilf stood firm at Schoenfield (1)

The albed troops, excited to the greatest degree by these favoureffort on that able circumstances, now pressed forward at all points to encircle like enems, and force them back, at the noint of the bayonet, into the suburbs of Lemsic, while the French, roused to the highest pileli of indignation by the defection of their allies, made the most desperate and heroic resistance An somer was Nanoleon informed of the defection of the Saxons, and that Schoenfeld, almost a suburb of Lemsie, was threatened, than, feeling the vital importance of preserving that city as his only line of retreat, he hastened with the coursesors of Amsonty, and a division of the Young Guard, to the menaced point. It was full time that succour should orrive, for when these veterans came up, Durutte and Delmas had been driven back close to Leipsic, the Swedish troops and penetrated to hubilgaesten, on the very edge of the city, while I angeron, furiously assaulting Schoenfeld, had three times penetrated into that village, and as often been dislodged by the heroic conrage of Harmont's men. Amounts and the guards were immediately mished forward by Durntte in the direction where there was a sort of chism, filled up only by a cordon of light troops, between the extreme right of the arms of Bohemia under Bubna, and the extreme left of the Prince-Royal under This powerful corps rapidly made its way, almost unresisted, in at the opening, but before it had advanced far, it was assailed with such vigour on the right by Pubus, and on the left by Bulow, supported by the English rocket brigade, under the able direction of Captain Bogne, that it was forced to retire, after fictions had been slain, with very heavy loss (2) At the same time, Schoenfeld was reliemently attacked by Count I angeron, and as gallantly defended by Starmont, five times did the Russlans penetrate in with irresistible vigour, and five times were they driven out by the devoted conrige of the French, Mirmont's aide-de-camp was struck down by his side, General Company was wounded, General Frederick killed in this terrible struggle. At length, at six at might, it was carried a sixth time anidst terrific cheers, and remained finally in the hands of the Russians, white four thousand of their bravest soldiers and an equal number of its intrepid defenders lay dead, or weltering in their blood, in its streets (5)

⁽¹⁾ formly $71.47 Bo t 136 137 Not et Comp at 142 lond 112 (5 The was the first sees out at the come a A

^{(*} The was the first ears out at the crew a dimost from lable logic ment of motors was necessarial hecopit to haid out of hoods was test in mea the encour the label superrefference has a tree upon the talk of who the new set is fire a rist of relate a few valuates. Hardly was this he like a more arts week when the economist of the he gale Capital F yes a had can he for the feet gale Capital F yes a had can he for the feet strake was the levest by a cash in half any selection for the feet of the feet of Such was the exhaustion of hoth parties by the long contibattle, and commencennance of this mortal struggle, that neither for the remainder of the day were able to undertake any considerable operations. ment of Napoléon's Gradually, however, and almost insensibly, the Allies gained ground on every side. Bulow, following up his success against Durntte and Nansonty, carried the villages of Stuntz and Sellerhausen, and drove the French on the north-east back under the very walls of Leipsic; while Sacken attacked the suburb of Rosenthal, from which he was only repelled by the devoted valour of Dombrowski's Poles and Arrighi's dragoons. But the near approach of the enemy on all sides now made it evident to Napoléon, that the position of Leipsic had become untenable, and dispositions were made for a retreat. He had early in the forenoon reinforced Bertrand, at Lindenan, with a considerable part of the reserves at Leipsic; and that general, driving Giulay before him, had succeeded in opening the road to Weissenfels, so that the principal line of their retreat was secured. Towards evening, the carriages and baggage of the army began to defile in that direction; and Blucher, observing the long files of chariots which filled the highway to France, immediately sent intimation to Schwartzenberg that the enemy was about to retreat, and dispatched D'York's corps, which had been kept in reserve during the day, to move upon Halle in order to anticipate his columns upon the left of the Saale (1).

Night came, more terrible even than day after such a conflict; cit held by for with it was brought the memory of the past, and the anticipaon the field tion of the future. To the incessant roll of musketry, and the roar of two thousand cannon, succeeded a silence yet more awful, interrupted only by a casual shot from the sentries as they paced their rounds, and the hollow murmur which, over a field of such vast extent, arose from the cries of the horses and the groans of the wounded. Soon the biyouacs were spread, and the heavens, in the whole circumference of the horizon, were illuminated by the ruddy glow of innumerable watch-fires. Silent and sad, Napoléon's marshals and generals assembled around him; little was said in the deliberations which succeeded; the position of the enemy, the dreadful circles of bivouac flames which surrounded them, the dead and the dying who environed them on every side, told but too plainly how near and imminent the dauger had become. Sorbier and Dulauloy, the commanders of the artillery, were requested to report on the condition of the army's ammunition; they stated that above two lumified thousand cannon-shot had been discharged during the battle, and to renew it was impossible without thirty or forty thousand fresh troops, and some bundred coissons of annumition. Neither could be obtained; for the last sabre and bayonet had been brought up on the preceding day: the grand park of ammunition had been deposited in Torgan, and Magdehurg and Erfurth were the nearest dépôts of provisions. During this eventful conference, Napoleon, overcome with fatigue, fell asleen in the chair on which he sat; his hands rested negligently folded on his breast, and his generals, respecting the respite of misfortune, preserved a profound silence. Suddenly, at the end of a quarter of an honr, he awoke, and easting a look of astonishment on the circle which surrounded him, exclaimed-" Am I awake, or is it a dream?" Soon recollecting, however, what had happened, he sent a message to the King of Saxony, announcing his intention to retreat, and leaving it to him either to follow his fortunes, or remain where he was, and conclude a separate peace with the Allies (2.)

⁽¹⁾ Bont. 138, 139. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 144. (2) Odel, il. 34, 35. Fain, ii. 430, 431. Fain, ii. 430. Kausler, 951, 952.

Nanaultan larent Ha 4 43 cF1

had been brought in during the day, had filled to overflowing every house it contained, the maimed and the dying were lying, without either bandages for their wounds or covering for their bodies, in the streets, while the incessant rolling of artillery waggons and eassons, on every avenue leading to Lindenau, the cries of the dravers, the neighing of the horses as the wheels of the carriages were locked together, and the continued march of the columns, kept every eye open, in that scene of unutterable woe, during the whole night At eight, Aanokon left his bisoune on the Thonberg, and took up his quarters in the hotel of Prussia. His horses were ordered to be ready to start at a moment's notice, but he himself sat up till daylight, with Berthier, Maret, and Caulaincourt, receiving reports and dietating orders. The hing of Saxony, amidst the wreck of his fortunes, was chiefly inconsolable from the defection of his troops during the battle, and repeatedly requested counsel from Aspoleon how he should act in the crisis But the Emperor had the generosity to leave him altogether unfettered in the course he was to pursue, and more than once expressed his admiration of the constancy of a prince who showed himself the same now, when surrounded by disaster, as when he inscribed on his triumphal arches the words, "To Napoléon, the greatful Frederick Augustus (1) "

Early on the morning of the 19th, the allied generals made preper tions for parations for a general attack on Lespose by daybreak tho French on it full army was in full retreat on all sides. Another and Augereau, with the whole five corps of cavalry, defiled across the suburb of Lindethe whole five corps of cavalry, defiled across the suburh of Lindenau, and issued forth over the chaussee which traversed the marshes of the Elster, but this was the sole issue for the army one single bridge mer that river was alone to receive the prodigious concourse of soldiers and carriages, for no orders to form other bridges had been given, excepting one of wood, which speedily gave may under the multitude by which it was beset. Regnier, with the division Durntte, which alone remained to him, was charged with the defence of the suburb of Rosenthal, Ney withdrew his troops into the eastern suburbs, while the corps of Lauriston, Macdonald, and Pomatowski, entered the town and took a position belinnil the barriers of the south They were destruct to the honourable post of the rearguard, but, though the two former still numbered twenty-five thousand combatants, the Poles had been reduced, by their two days' bloody fighting on the banks of the Fister, to two thousand seven hundred men (2) The total loss of the French army, in the two preceding days, had been fully forty thousand men; but nearly sixty thousand were still in Leapsic, besides an equal number who were defiling on the road to France the barriers were all strongly palisaded, the adjacent walls and houses loopholed, and such a force, defending house by house the suburbs of the city so strengthened, could certainly, it was hoped, make good the jost till the evacuation of the ammunition waggons and cannon was effected (5).

No sooner were the allied troops made aware of the preparations after fer in the French army for a retreat, than a universal cry of joy l urst at terms from the ranks, and the whole army, almost by involuntary move-

Alcanwhile the allied columns were pressing in on all sides; and be preserved in the defence. Despairing of the possibility of carrying on inco innumerable artiflery waggons and chariots, the French set fire to three hundred which were in park before the gate of Dresden; and the sight of the flames, by rendering it certain that the enemy intended to exacuate the place. redoubled the ardour of the alhed troops. The resistance, however, was beyond expectation vicorous Sacken was twice repulsed from the suburb of Halle beyond the Partha, and only succeeded at length in foreing his way in by the aid of Lang(ron's corps, and the sacrifice of almost the whole regiment of Archangel. Still the arch over the Partha and the inner suburb were to be carried, but the Russians crossed the bridge in the face of two heavy guns pouring forth grane-shot, and driving down the main street, commenced a murderous warfare with the French, who were firing from the windows and tops of the houses. At the same time an obstinate conflict was going on at the barrier of Hinther-Thor, where Rulow, supported by six Swedish battalions, after a furious conflict at length forced the cate, and commenced a guerilla warfare with the French at the windows and in the houses. The assailants, however, were now nouring in on all sides, and further resistance was r P and attalions forced the

nugen
' dimuli, l'iko a
' is-ss of every t, like

e only

the first find frightful explosion. The corporal charged with the mine which had been run under it by orders of Napoleon, hearing the loud hurrals template and all sides, and seeing some of the entity's trailleurs approaching in the gardens of the suburbs on eather hand, naturally concerned that the Trench troops had all passed and the bagging only remained, and that the time was therefore came to fire the train, in order to stop the pursuit of the Miles. Its accordingly applied the match, the arch was blown into the air, and the present charged, which the pulse the backet or the backet or the state of the pursuit of the pursuit of the state of the stat

Trench troops had all passed and the baggage only remained, and that the time was therefore come to fire the train, in order to stop the pursuit of the Allies. It accordingly applied the match, the arch was blown into the alr, and the p-stage stopped, while the only other lendge over the river, histily and imperfectly constructed, bud shortly before such under the weight of the crowds by which it was beset. A shrick of horror, more terrible thun even the lon fest cries of battle, burst from the dense multitude which crowded for the edge of the chains, when they found the arch destroyed, the ranks limited across, but the greater part perished in the deep and middly channel.

ratowski also reached the side, recled as he strove to mount the opposite bank, and fell back on his noble rider, who perished in the water; Lauriston, Regnier, and twenty other generals, with fifteen thousand soldiers, were made prisoners; besides twenty-three thousand siek and wounded who lay in the hospitals and private houses. Two hundred and fifty pieces of cannon, nine hundred chariots and ammunition waggons; an incalculable quantity of baggage; the King of Saxony, two generals of corps, seven generals of division, twelve of brigade, and thirty thousand other prisoners, constituted the trophies, during the three days of a battle in which the total loss of the French was upwards of sixty thousand men. The loss of the Allies was also immense; it amounted to nearly eighteen hundred officers, and forty-one thousand private soldiers, killed and wounded, in the three days' combat. A prodigious sacrifice; but which, great as it is, humanity has no cause to regret, for it delivered Europe from French bondage, and the world from revolutionary aggression (4).

At two o'clock the carnage ceased at all points; the rattle of sovereigns musketry was no longer heard, and a distant roar in all directions alone indicated that the waves of this terrible tempest were gradually sinking to rest. But what pen can paint the scene which the interior of the city now exhibited? Grouped together in wild confusion, lay piles of the dead and heaps of the dying; overturned artillery caissons, broken guns, pillaged baggage waggons, and dejected prisoners, were to be seen beside exulting bands of the victors, and dense columns of the Allies, who in admirable order forced their way through the throng, and, amidst cheers that made the very welkin to ring, moved steadily forward towards the principal square of the city. On the side of the suburb of Machranstadt in particular, the frightful accumulation of wounded fugitives, and as yet unwounded but captive warriors, recalled the awful image of the passage of the Berezina. Amidst this unparalleled scene, the allied sovereigns, at the head of their respective troops, made their entrance into the city. The Emperors of Russia and Austria, with the King of Prassia, surrounded by their illustrious generals and brilliant staffs, came by the barriers on the south, the Prince-Royal of Sweden by those on the east, and all met in the great square. At this heartstirring sight, the enthusiasm of the people knew no bounds: all felt as if themselves and all dear to them had escaped from death; the city resounded with acclamations, handkerchiefs waved from every window, and merry chimes rang from every steeple; and tears, more eloquent than words, rolling over almost every cheek, told that the tyrant was struck down, and Germany delivered (2).

While these scenes, outstripping even the salendour of oriental C mmrace ment of Napoleon s imagination. Nere passing in the city of Leusic, the French army. sad, disorganized, and dejected, was wending its way towards serveds 11 c Machranstadt The Emperor, after passing the last bridge, that of the mill of Landenau, ascended to the best floor of the windmill to examine the state of the army, but there his exhaustion was such that he fell asleen. and slent profoundly for some time, amidst the distant roar of the cannon at Leansie, and the dan of horsemen, guns, and foot-soldiers, who hurried in a turnituous torrent past the base of the edifiee. Wakened by the explosion of the bridge, on the other side of the marshes, he hastily arranged some guns in battery, to guard against an immediate attack, but finding he was not pursued, and having learned the real nature of the catastrophe, he continued his course more leisurely to Machranstadt, where the whole guard had already arrayed, and where headquarters were established for the night. But at was already apparent how much the continued fatigues and calumities they had undergone had weakened the authority of the I mneror, and dissolved the discipline of the army. The troops, with feelings embittered by misfortune, marched in sullen and moods desperation in o cheers were heard on the approach of the Emperor pullage and rapine were universal, the bonds of discipline, even in the guard itself, were relayed, and the officers apneared to have lost at once the power and the inclination to ston the disorder which prevailed (1)

Margaret. On the side of the Allies, a very considerable dislocation of the of the all d immense force which had combated at I cipsic immediately took the battle place Bernadotte with the Swedes, and a considerable part of his army, as well as Benningsen's force, moved towards Hamburg, where the presence of Dayoust, with a powerful corps, both required observation and promised an important acquisition. Idenau was detached towards Dresden, to and in the blockade of St. Cyr. who, with thirty five thousand men, was now altogether cut off, and might be expected specifity to surrender Bluther, with the corps of Langeron and Sacken, moved after the French on the great road to Mayence, and reached Shenditz the same mulit lillork was advanced to Halle, and Giulay with his Austrians marched on Pegan, but the great body of the albed army, worn out with its toils, remained in the neighbourhood of I capsic. These movements, and in particular the speedy removal of Bernadotte from the headquarters of the albeil sovereigns to a separate, but yet important command, were recommended not less by their military importance than by political considerations of yet greater weight. The Grand Albance, though hitherto futhful to itself, and prosperous beyond what the most sanguine could have anticipated, was composed of inaterials which, when the pressure of common danger was removed, could hardly be expected to draw cordially together. Bernadotte, in particular, could not be an object of very warm interest to the I imperor Francis, by whom his insults at Vienna, fourteen years before, when ambassador of the Directory, were far from being forgotten (2), his backwardness, especially in the comployment of the Swedish troops, during the whole campaign, was well known at hendquarters and he himself, as he admits, felt that he was in a false position, and that fe would be better at a distance from the scene of I rench carnage and humilia 11011 (5).

⁽⁴⁾ Falu it 441 thir) 5,43 44 (2) Avr bit. 210 (3) he n, is, 419 410 Nicos, de Charles Joan 6

[&]quot;The Prace-Royal has not me in me to fix be be been admirately the decision of flowburg The fix is the not be proposed for a fixe part of the bearing the was to a fixe part of the part o

The funeral of Prince Poniatowski terminated the last scene of Prince Points of this bloody drama. Victors and vanquished vied with each other in striving to do honour to the hero, who, faithful to his country and his oaths, exhibited, amidst the general defection of Europe, the glorious example of miconquerable firmness and unshaken fidelity. After bravely combating at the head of his heroic but wasted band of followers, in the suburbs of Leipsic, to retard the advance of the Allies, he was retiring to the banks of the Pleisse, still keeping up a desperate resistance, when an explosion was heard, and the cry arose that the bridge was blown up. " Gentlemen," said he to the officers around him, drawing his sword, "it now behoves us to die with honour." At the head of this gallant band he made his way, though severely wounded, through a column of the Allies which strove to intercept his retreat, and reached the banks of the Pleisse, which he succeeded in passing by dismonuting from his horse. Exhausted with fatigue and loss of blood he mounted another, and, seeing no other possibility of escape, plunged into the deep stream of the Elster, and by great exertions reached the other side. In striving, however, to mount the opposite bank, the hind feet of the horse were entangled in the mud; it fell backward, and the exhansted chief sunk to rise no more. His funeral was celebrated with extraordinary nomp by the allied sovereigns, who hastened to do honour to a warrior whose military career had been unsullied, and who, in the last extremity, preferred death to surrender; but a still more touching testimony to his worth was borne by the tears of the Poles, who crowded round his bier, and anxionsly strove to touch the pall which covered the remains of the last remnant of their rayal line, and the last hopes of their national indenendence (1).

On the day following his dreadful defeat, Napoléon arrived at March of the French Weissenfels. In passing over the plain of Lutzen, the soldiers east army to Websens a inclancially look on the theatre of their former glory, and many shed tears at the sad reverse of which it exhibited so striking a monnment. What had availed them the efforts made, the sacrifices endmed, the blood shed, since that heroic combat had been maintained? Where were now the young hearts which then beat high, the glittering hopes that were then formed, the ardent visions which then floated before them " in life's morning march, when their bosons were young?" Before the blood-stained environs of Kaia and Starsiedel, defiled, in wild confusion, the tumultuous array of a beaten, dejected, and half-famished army: three-fourths of those who there had fought so bravely for the independence of France had since perished, or were now captives; the few that remained, more like a funeral procession than a warlike array, passed on pensive and silent; they envied the lot of those who had fallen, for they would not witness the degradation of France.

"The boast of chivalry, the pomp of power, And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave; Await alike the inevitable hour-The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

The Old Guard halted at Rippail, near the spot where Bessières had been slain the day before the battle of Lutzen, and there Napoléon experienced a momentary gratification in seeing a column of five thousand Austrian prisoners, with all the standards taken at Dresden, defile before him. But this enman, of every French prisoner, awakened in his breast the most cruel feelings," - Mémoires de (1) Lah. i. 409, 410. Rown Portefeuille de 1813, ii. 420, 421, Charles-Jean, ii. 100.

soment was of short duration. As the corns and regiments, in utter disorder and for the most part mingled together, crowded past, at became painfully exident that all the Germans had left their colours a several even of the Polish regiments had passed over to the enemy; of Poniatowski's followers, only six bundred foot soldiers, and fifteen hundred horsemen remained, and they had engaged to abide by the Emperor's standards only for eight days more. Already the Allies were pressing the rear of the army; Sacken's cavalry, under Wassichikow, had made two thousand prisoners; and the great road being out off by Giulay, who from Pegau had moved on Naumburg, it became necessary to throw bridges over the Saale, in order to gain by a cross march the other highway at Freyberg. Such was the emotion of Bertrand, who recould the Emperor at Weissenfels, and there first became acquainted, from the confusion of the columns, with the magnitude of the disaster that had been sustained, that he shed tears, and openly besought him to hasten forward (1), even if it were alone, to Erfurth and Mavence, and preserve in his nerson the fortunes of France

On the day following, the retreat was continued in the direction of Freyberg, but as they could not reach that place, the Emperor to Frey passed the night in a cabin on the road side, only nine feet source. Blucher and Sacken, continuing the pursuit, arrived the same day at Weissenfels, and immediately set about the construction of new bridges in lieu of the wooden ones, over which the French had passed, which had been destroved Burning with anxiety to overtake the enemy, the Prussing linesarts pushed on the moment the passage was practicable, and came up with them at the passage of the Unstrutt at Freyberg, where, after a sharp conflict, the rearguard was overthrown, with the loss of a thousand prisoners, eighteen guns, and an immense quantity of amminition and bagginge. On the same day, Giulay had a more serious affair with the enemy at the defile of Roesen That position, which is extremely strong towards Anumburg. offers scarce any obstacles to an enemy advancing from the left of the Saale, Bertrand, accordingly, without difficulty dislodged the enemy from it; and once master of the deble, its strength in the other direction enabled him easily to maintain himself in it against the repeated attacks of the Austrian corps. The passage of the Unstrutt at Freyberg, however, evinced in striking colours the disorganized state of the army. Such was the accumulation of menny's guns began to play on the dense mass, the most frightful disorder cusued every one rushed headlong towards the bridges, and the limites began to whistle over the head of Napolčon lumnelf. Finding that he could no longer be of any service, the citally turned as de the favourite bay horse which he had mounted, and penetrating through several narrow and difficult defices, reached Eckartsberg, where he passed the inglitin the same house from whence, six months before, he had set out, radiant with hope, to try his firtune at the head of a brilliant host on the Saxon plains. Through the whole inglit, the army, like a formost former, never reased to roll along in wild confusion, and with dissonant cries, under the windows of the apartment in which the Emperer slept, where all was still and mouriful as the grave (2).

During these days, the greater part of the allied army marched by Napoléon arrives at the main road through Naumburg and Jena; and passing Weimar, Erforth, took post on the road to Erfurth, near Nohra, while the army of where Muat leaves the Prince-Royal continued its march by Merseberg, in the direction of Cassel. In this way the latter repeated exactly the pursuit of the grand army by Kutusoff, on the parallel line of march from Malaroslawitz to Krasnoi; and contenting themselves with harassing the rear of the French army by the army of Silesia, compelled them, by this able disposition, to recoil on the wasted line of their former advance. On the 22d, the French retreated with such expedition over the great plains which stretched from the neighbourhood of Eckartsberg to Erfurth, that even the Cossacks were unable to overtake them; and on the following day they reached the latter town, where fortified citadels gave a feeling of security to the army, while the distribution of provisions from extensive magazines assuaged the pangs of hunger which were now so severely felt. Murat there quitted Nanoleon, and bent his course for his own dominions. The pretext assigned for this departure was threatened disturbances in his dominions, and the necessity of providing for their defence in the dangers with which Italy would soon be menaced. But though these reasons were plausible, and not altogether without foundation, his real motives were very different. A secret correspondence had commenced with Metternich; and the King of Naples, in the hope of preserving his crown in the general wreck, was preparing to abandon his brother-in-law and benefactor. Napoléon, who, ever since his desertion of his post on the Vistula in the preceding spring, had watched his proceedings with a jealous eye, had no difficulty in divining his real motives; but he dissembled these feelings, and embraced his old companion in arms, as he parted with him, with a melancholy presentiment, which was too fatally realized, that he should never see him again (1). Napoléon passed two days at Erfurth, entirely engrossed in the labours of his cabinet. There he composed and sent off his famous bulletin, giving the account of the battle of Leipsic; from the place, and the very hotel, where five years before, during the conferences with the Emperor Alexander, his fortunes had attained their highest elevation (2), he now was doomed to date the narrative of his decisive overthrow. These two days' rest had a surprising effect in restoring the spirit and rectifying the disorders of the army; and then might be seen the clearest proof how much the rapid diminution which, since hostilities recommenced, the French army had undergone, had been owing to the almost total want of magazines of provisions for their subsistence, and the consequent necessity of individual pillage: all the effects of the ahominable revolutionary maxim, that war should maintain war. So indignant was the Emperor at this result of physical privations, which he never felt himself, that on witnessing the effect of the magazines of Erfurth in restoring order, he said to the officers around, "Now, only see what a set they are; they are going to the devil. I shall lose eighty thousand men from hence to the Rhine in this manner." Even in this moment, however, when his beaten and dissolving army was only held together by the temporary supply of the magazines which they passed on their march, he was dreaming of fresh projects of conquest, and said repeatedly, "From hence to the Rhine; in spring I shall have two hundred and fifty thousand combatants." He was perfectly calm and collected in his manner, however; firm and unshaken in his views; and heard' with equanimity all that was addressed to him, even on the necessity of maling peace with the allies the subject of all others the most repugnant to his server thoughts (4).

Stay of the French army at

The army underwent a great change of composition during its the French brief sojourn at Erfurth, eminently descriptive of the awful catastrophes which had recently thinned its ranks. All that remained were formed into six corps (2), the sad remains of thirteen, which, when the armistice terminated, followed the standards of the Emperor. Three whole corns, viz. those of Lauriston, Regmer, and Populton sky, had disappeared dueing the citastrophe of Leibsic, and never were heard of rean in the I reach army Oudmot's had been dissolved after the disaster of Dennewitz, two, VIZ St -Car's and Vandamme's, had been left in Dresden, Davoust was in Hamburg, with detachments in Torgan and Magdeburg, and Raph still held the ramparts of Bantzie. Also e a hundred and ten thousand men were left to their fate in the garrisons on the Elbe, in Magdeburg alone there were thirty thousand, in Hunburg twenty-five, in Dresden thirty-five, in Torgan fourteen thousand. The garrisons of these places and been swelled to this enormous amount by the multitude of stranglers, sick and wounded men. who sought a refuge under shelter of their walls, after the retreat of the grand army from the Filie, but they proved rather a burden than an advantage to their garrisons, for they brought with them the seeds of physical contagion and mental depression, from the miscries and privations of the campuzn, and augmented the number of mouths, which pressed upon their now strategied supplies of provisions. The whole force which the Imperor brought with him from Erfurth towards the filune was under nucly thousand men, while twice that number were left blockaded in the fortresses on the I lbe, the Oder, and the Vistula a most extraordinary and unnaralleled result of the compagn, and saving little for the general plan of operations which he had adopted (5) The stay of the Emperor at Erfurth, even for two days, filled the retreet of entirens, most of whom had been reduced to destitution by the con and run at timied exactions of the French army, with the utmost anxiety, for they were afraid that, to complete their miscries, they were in he myolyed in the horrors of a siege. It was necessity, however, arising from the dilandated state of the artiflery, and the disorganized condition of his troops, which alone dictated this stoppage, and no sooner were the curs and cursons replemshed from the magazines of Franth, and the troops partially fed and arranged in different corps, than the army resumed its merch for the tiling, and on the same day reached fother I lucher, with unwearied activity, followed on its traces, and not only collected all the abandoned gans and captored the stragglers, but attacked and defeated the rearguard near that town, with the loss of two thousand | risoners The grand allied army, with the headquarters of the I nmeror of Bussia and hing of Prussia, followed through the Thurmgian forest, but so rapid was the retreat of the French towards the Rhine, that they were mable to keep pace with them, and beyond that woody region, the fish of pursuing the retiring columps was devolved on the Cossreks These formi lable light troops, however, under their renowned lea lers, I latoff, Orloff Denizulf, Labernicheff, and howaishi, continued the pursuit with indefatigable perseverance, not only were all foraging parties on either side of the road cut off, but the while stragglers made prisoners, and a vast quantity of abandoned guns and ammunition collected at every step. The certainty of being made prisoners had no effect in deterring a large part of the army from straggling. Such were the pangs they underwent from hunger, that they were often glad of a pretence for yielding themselves to the enemy for the sake of momentary relief; and the woods, for some leagues, were filled with isolated men, great part of whom sank, from pure exhaustion, into the arms of death. With the exception of the frost and snow, the retiring army presented the same appearances as in the Moseow retreat; desertion prevailed to a frightful extent, especially among the few troops of the Rhenish confederacy which still adhered to the fortunes of Napoleon; the road was strewed, the ditches on either side filled, with the dead bodies of men and horses who had dropped down from the effects of fatigue and famine; and so rapid was the process of dissolution in the whole army, that it was hard to say, in the last days of the retreat, whether it was not melting away as fast as the host which retreated from Moscow had done under the severity of the Russian winter (1).

March of Wrede and the Baya-tians to the While Napoléon however, was thus making by rapid strides for the Rhine, a new and unexpected enemy was arising in that quarter, who threatened to intercept his retreat, and renew on the banks of the Maine the horrors of the Berezina. Bavaria, though the last to join the alliance, had taken the most decisive steps to demonstrate her sincerity in the new cause which she had adopted. No sooner were the cabinet of Munich relieved, by the march of Angerean for Leipsic, of the apprehensions excited by the presence of his corps near their frontier at Wurtzburg, than they yielded, as already mentioned, to the solicitations of the Allies, and concluded a peace with the cabinet of Vienna on the 8th October, in virtue of which Bayaria acceded to the grand alliance. Military operations of the highest importance were not slow in following upon this diplomatic conversion. The Bavarian army, under Marshal Wrede, which was stationed at Brannan, opposite to the Austrian corps under the Prince of Renss, joined itself to the latter force, and both united set out in the middle of October in the direction of Frankfort on the Maine, under the command of Wrede. The whole consisted of three divisions of Bayarian infantry, and two brigades of cavalry, of that state; and two divisions of Austrian infantry and one of cavalry, and numbered fifty-eight thousand combatants. On the 19th they passed the Danube at Donowerth, and Wrede marched with such expedition, that on the 27th headquarters were at Aschaffenburg, from whence he detached ten thousand men to Frankfort; and on the 29th he took post in the forest of HANAU, stationing his troops across the great road, and blocking up entirely the retreat of the French army to Mayence (2).

rorces with which Napoléon brought back with him were much which Napoléon advanced against him.

The forces which Napoléon brought back with him were much more considerable in point of numerical amount; but a large part of them were so completely disorganised and depressed by the privations they had undergone during their retreat, that the contest between the two armies could not be said to be unequal. Nearly ninety thousand merriad set out around his standards from Erfurth; but ten thousand had strayed from their colours, or been made prisoners in the subsequent forced marches, and when the army approached the Maine, it did not number above eighty thousand combatants. Full thirty thousand of these, also, were either stragglers, or so far in the rear's to be of no value in and the second

⁽¹ Vict. et Conq. xxii. 153. Bout. 154, 155. (2) Jom. iv. 487. Bont, 154, 155. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 153.

the shock which was approaching; so that, to clear his passage, Napoléon could not rely upon more than fifty thousand meu; and his once magnificent artiflery of threen hundred pueses was reduced to two hundred guns. They were, for the most part, however, the artiflery of the guard, second to mone in Europe for vigour and efficiency; and the troops, aware of their danger, ardently desirous to get back to France, and perfectly sensible that no other way remained but what they could win at their swords' point might be expected to fight with the courage of despair. The guards, moreover, upon whom the weight of the contest was hkely to fall, had suffered comparatively little in the late disasters; and Bertrand's corps had been an enture stranger to the disasters of the last two days' combat at Leipsic. The Emperor, therefore, who had slept on the 20th at Langen-Schold, the chateau of the Prince of Isemberg, no sooner heard that the road to Mayenco was blocked up by the Bavarian troops, than he made his dispositions for an attack [41].

neservices Wrede, who had driven the garrison of Wurtzburg into the citaof headed del, and so secured the passage of that important town on the 27th, ped the way, and soon came into communication with the Cossaeks of Czhernicheff and Orloff Denizoff, which hovered round the ontckirts of the French army. No somer was the junction formed than the Bayarian general arranged his troops in order of battle, and the position which they occupied was so peculiar as to be entirely different from any which had formed the illicative of combat since the commencement of the revolutionary war. The allted army stood in front of Ilanau; the right wing resting on the Kenzig, the left in celicion on the road from Lifurith to Fraukfort. Sixty pieces of cannon were planted in the centre between the bridge of Gelnhausen over the Kenzig and the great road, to play on the advancing columns of the enemy which they intermitted to debouche from the forest. The vanguard was posted at flucking the state of the control of the of Lambo. A large body of tight troops occupied the forest, to retard the advance of the enemy: that great tract of wood extends for above two legger in breadth towards Erfwith, and is composed of old cake, many of them as large as those in Windsor forest, whose aged stems at times rise out of close thickets of underwood, at others, overshadow with their spreading boughs beautiful vistas of greenward, where numerous herds of swine feed on the acorns; realizing thus, in the days of Appoléon, that some of primitive nature in northern Europe, in the time of thehard Cour de Liou, over which modern genum has thrown so enchance a high (2).

The position which the altied army thus occupied, resembled, in antitary point of view, that held by Moreau at the western side of white the forest of Bohenhinder; and if Wrede had been in antificient strength to keep his ground in front of the issues from the weed, and hinder the enemy from deploying, at the same time that a division was thrown across the thickets, on the flauk of the advancing columns, like that of litchepains at Ilohenhinden, he might possibly have realized the brilling

⁽⁴⁾ Fam. 20. 472. 473 Joss, in $57, 435 Bow., 157, 438 Naml e. 227, 228.

⁽I) Personal Discreption Feet 117 Aut, et Cong And 15h, he w, is 675. The opening series of the furnities f union success of the great republican general on that memorable spot (1). But his army was not in sufficient strength to effect such an object. After deducting three battalions left to blockade the citadel of Wurtzburg, and ten thousand imprudently detached to Frankfort, he could not bring above forty-five thousand men into the field; and, with such a force, it was impossible to expect that the retreat of eighty thousand combatants, with two hundred pieces of cannon, fighting with the conrage of despair, could be arrested: the more especially when the head of the columns was composed of the Old and Young Guard. Nor was the position of the Allies exempt from peril; for, if they were defeated—and the French army was in a condition to follow up its successes—they ran the risk of being thrown back upon the Maine, and destroyed by superior forces, in attempting to make their way across that broad and deep river (2).

Commence-ment of the At eleven o'clock on the forenoon of the 50th the battle commenced. The French columns, preceded by a cloud of tirailleurs, action, and the passage advanced in dense masses—the artillery following the great road, by the Lieuch the light troons spread out in the this let and coordinate and coordinate the light troops spread out in the this let and coordinate the light troops are also as a second of the light troops are a second out in the this let and coordinate the light troops are a second out in the this let and coordinate the light troops are a second out in the this let and coordinate the light troops are a second out in the this let are a second out in the second out in the second out in the this let are a second out in the second out in t the light troops spread out in the thicket and greensward an either side—and soon a warm fire began in the forest. The dark recesses of the wood were illuminated by the frequent flashes of the musketry: the verdant alleys were hastily traversed by files of armed men, and the action began like a magnificent limiting party in the forest of Fontainelileau. Victor's and Macdonald's corps, now reduced to five thousand combatants, headed the advance, and with some difficulty made their way, fighting as they advanced through the wood to the plain beyond it; but when they came there, and endeavoured to deploy on its south-western skirts, they were erushed by the concentric fire of seventy pieces of cannon, which stood before the allied line, and for four hours the French army was unable to clear its way through the narrow plain which lay between the forest and the banks of the Kinzig. During this period, however, the guards and main hody of the French army had time to come up; and Napoleon, now seriously disquieted for his line of retreat, immediately ordered a general attack on the enemy. General Curial, with two battalions of the Old Guard, dispersed as tiraillenrs, were hrought forward to the front, and began to engage the Bavarian sharpshooters; the hardy veterans soon gained ground, and won not only the issues of the forest, but part of the little plain scattered with oaks which lay beyond; and to the space thus won, the artillery of the gnard, under Drouot, was immediately brought forward. This admirable officer commenced his fire with fifteen guns; but they were gradually augmented to fifty, and soon acquired a decided superiority over the batteries of the enemy, whose artillery, though more numerous, returned the fire feebly, from an approheusion of exhausting their ammunition, the reserves of which had not yet come up from Aschaffenberg. Under cover of Dronot's terrible fire, Nansouty and Schastiani debouched with the cavalry of the guard, which had suffered less than any other part of the army in the preceding actions, and hy a vigorous charge overthrew every thing that was opposed to them. Wrede, seeing his danger, collected his cavalry, and the Bavarian horse and squares endeavoured to rally behind Czhernieliess's Cossaeks; but although the Russian dragoons combated bravely, they were unable to withstand the thundering charges of the French cuirassiers, and the point-blank discharge of the artillery of the gnard; and the whole left wing of the Allies gave way and fled towards the kinzig, leaving the plain between the river and the wood, and the road to Frankfort, open to the enemy. As a last resource, the Basanan general mide an effort on his right (4), but Napoleon queskly pushed forward two lattalions of the Old Guard, who arrested his advance, and Wrede, despairing of success, withdrew the shattered remains of his army behind the kinzig, under protection of the cannon of Hanau.

⁽¹⁾ Ante, iv. 193. (2) Jom. iv. 487, 488, Bout. 157, Yavd. i. 229, iii. 388.

While this vehement conflict was going on at the entrance of the Muje this venement commer was going on as an analysis and danger mood. Napoleon himself, in the depths of the forest, was a prey to the most anxious solicitude. Fresh troops were continually compa up from the rear, but the lughway and alleys through the forest were already blocked up with carriages and cannon, and the increasing multitude. when no assue could be obtained, only agemented the confusion and embarrassment in its wooded recesses. Nanolcon, unquiet and anxious, was mean time walking backwards and forwards on the lughway, near the bend which the road makes, conversing with Caulaincourt. A bomb fell near them to a ditch bordering the highway, the latter joinediately placed himself between the Emperor and the danger, and they continued their conversation as if nothing had occurred. The attendants of the Emperor hardly ventured to draw their breath, but the bomb had sunk so deep in the ditch, that it was uterented from bursting. Veanwhile the forest on all sides resounded with the the t s of arms which Ind been torn from the sides of these venerable patriarciss of the forest by the violent strokes. When Wrede's last and despecate onset was made on the I rendel left, in princular, the combatants approached so near that their cries were distinctly heard, and the tops of the trees were violentally agitated, as in a hurricane, by the bullets which whistled through their branches. The repulse of that attack by the infantry of the Old Guard removed, indeed, the danger, and opened the road to Frinkfort, but the Emperor, notwithstanding, did not march on with the advinced guird, but spent the night in the forest, hic Buchard Co. ur de I ion, beside a blazing watchfire under the oaks, where next morning he received a deputation from the magistrates of Ilanan, who came to beseech him to spare their city the horror of an assault(2).

Conservation and available the right after the battle, the French army defiled withthe state of the first the neglet after the battle, the French army defiled withthe state of the three states of the state of arting took place. When the 20 hor world tool profession was the parts of the first profession with the parts of the first part

⁽¹⁾ bet et Cong nu i 135 137 Dout 1,8 459 Fain i 417 4"9 Neede t O's Teopert School Rev I 349

⁽²⁾ bales in 4°2, 479 Nort un l'etefen ba de

^{1913 1. 131}The folder lattle at Hause is one of the more iniercate go if the many spots on the root acet of its oracle to which the expose at it is processed as a proport which the expose at it is processed as a preinterduce to be a said from the extramations of it sharing bear the theater of the fair of he derents conflicts as the extraord any and possess others of the off for the fair of the other other of the other of the other of the other of the other other and, in order to protect his retreat, Marmont was left before Hanau. with a Out. 31.3 considerable part of the army. At two in the morning of the 51st, he began to bombard the town, and with such effect, that it was evacuated early in the forenoon by the Austrian garrison, and immediately taken possession of by the French forces. No sooner was this point d'appui secured on the other side of the Kinzig, than Marmont attacked the right of the Allies posted behind the road to Asehaffenberg, and with such impetuosity, that it was forced to give way, and thrown back in disorder on the Maine, where it must inevitably have been destroyed, if the guards and cuirassiers of the French army had been at hand to support the advantage. They had, however, meanwhile passed on towards Frankfort, and Marmont, in consequence, solieitous only to secure the passage of the rearguard of Mortier, paused in the eareer of success, and at two in the afternoon fell back towards Hanau, followed by Wrede, who, stung to the quick by the disaster he had experieneed, himself led on his forces, and stormed that town at the head of his troops; but, in pursuing the Italian rearguard towards the Kinzig, he reeeived a severe wound, which obliged him to relinquish the command. At the same time, another column of the Allies drove the French over the bridge of Lamboi; but, pursuing their advantage too warmly in the plain in front of the forest, they were attacked in flank by a French column issuing from the woods, and driven back with great loss. These ehecks, and the wound of Wrede, rendered General Tresnel, who sueceeded him in the command, more eircumspeet: relinquishing all hope of inflicting further injury on the retreating army, he withdrew his troops behind the Kinzig, and Marmont eontinued his retreat to Frankfort, where the same night he was joined by Mortier with the rearguard (1); who having heard an exaggerated account of the losses of the army on the preceding day, had, by marching all the preceding night by Langensibold, succeeded by a circuitous route in avoiding the scene of danger.

The battle of Hanau cost the Allies ten thousand men, of whom the battle, and passage four thousand were prisoners; and the French lost seven thousand the Blune sand, of whom three thousand were wounded and left in the former rest, from want of carriages to convey them away. The road to embled an immense wreek, being strewed with ammunition and down guns, dead horses and wounded men, who were the precipitate retreat of the French army. Napoléon left to the 1st November: soon the red domes and steeples of Mayence appearant view; the army defiled in mournful silence over the long bridge which it had so often passed in the buoyancy of anticipated victory; the Emperor remained six days in that stronghold, to collect the ruined remains of his vast army, and then set out for Paris, where he arrived on the 9th; and the French eagles bade a rinal added to their punishment (2).

Reflections on this buttle. The battle of Hanau was a dignified termination to the exploits of the French revolutionary arms beyond the Rhine, and threw a parting ray of glory over their long and successful career. Its lustre reflects in an especial manner on the imperial guard, by whom the victory was almost exclusively gained; and certainly no troops could, under circumstances of greater difficulty and depression, have achieved a more glorious triumph. When we reflect that the soldiers who, after sharing in the dangers and witnessing the disasters of the greatest battle recorded in history, were obliged to toil for above two hundred miles through a wear-tome and disastrous releteral, suddenly found themelves, at its close, assaided by a freeli array, superior to that which at the moment they could array against it, and which entirely blocked up their only line of retreat—we miss admit that, equally with the discipline and resolution of the guard during the Russan retreat, their victory on this occasion demonstrates the unconquerable firmness of those iron hands, whom this discipline and victories of Nanolsho had nursed sword; and on the injustice of the clamour which has been raised against Teluchakoff, because with less than thirty thousand men, and a bundred and fifty guns, he did not succeed in stopping Napoléon at the Berezina, who had forty thousand efficient combatants, independent of as many stragglers, and two hundred and fifty guns at his disposal (2). In truth, the success of the French at the Berezina, of the Russians at Culm, of the Euclish at Cornuna. and of Aapoleon at Hanau, demonstrates the truth of the old miage, that it is in general well to make a bridge of gold for o flying enemy. Authing is often more fallacious, in such a case, than to judge of the prostration of thostrength of an army by the number of its stragglers, the disorder of its columns, the wreck of guns and ammunition waggons, which tracks its course, or the languor with which it resists when attacked by the parsauna enemy. All these are the beginning of rum, but they are not rum itself; and if their retreat is threatened, and the necessity of opening a passage at the sword's point becomes evident to every capacity, it is surprising how soon order will be resumed under the pressure of impending danger, and a desperate valour will compensate the loss of the largest amount of material resources

⁽¹⁾ Bout. 161, 162. Fain, ii. 480, 481. Vaud. (2) Fain, ii. 480, 481. Bout. 164. Vict, et Conq. 252, 253. Wrede's Official Account. Schooll, Rec. xxii. 160, 161.

La suban of While the sail remains of the Prench arms were retiring across the Rhine, the allied troops followed closely on their footsteps; coil princh of the attes the forces of central and eastern Europe poured in productors the Ruine strength down the valley of the Maine On the 4th November the advanced guards, under Prince Schwartzenberg, entered bruikfort; and on the same day the headquarters of the allied sovernight reached hth Xov Aschaffenberg On the day following, Alexander made his entry into Frankfort at the head of twenty thousand horse, amulat the universal transport of the lubabitants; and the imperial headquarters were fixed there, till preparations could be made for the ardnous undertaking of crossing the Blune, and carying the war into the heart of France. At the same time their forces on all sules rapidly approached that frontier stream Schwartzenberg forced the passage of the Midde, and advanced his headquarters to flockst, within two leagues of Hayence; while Blucker, on his right, approached the Ithine, and fixed his headquarters at Gissen-A few days rice, Glulay received Instructions to attack Hochheim, a small town fortified with five redoubts, which stood a little in advance of the titede-post of Mayence at Cassel, and was garrisoned by six thousand nem, under Guilleminot, supported by Moran I with an equal force. So formidable, however, were the columns which the Albes had destined for its assault-consisting of Ginlay's column, which attacked the town freelf, while Prince Mors of Latchtenstein turned its right, and threatened its communication with it r

Rhine—that the place was speedily carried, and the French were driven, with the loss of three innidred prisoners, into the tete-de-pont of Cassel, the last fortified nost in that quarter which they possessed on the right bank of the Rhine (1).

Winter This combat was the last of the campaign, so far as the grand both rattles armies on either side were concerned. Exhansted with a contest of such unexampled fatigue and vehemence, both commanders, put their forces into winter quarters. Those of Napoleon, entirely on the left bank of the Rhine, extended from Cologue on the north, to Strasburg on the south; but the bulk of his forces were stationed at Mayence, Coblentz, and opposite to the centre of the allied forces around Frankfort. The grand allied army, as well that of Blucher as of Schwartzenberg, extended along the course of the Rhine, from Kehl to Coblentz; the army of Silesia, forming the right, opposite to Coblentz, and spreading up the hilly part of the Rhine to Ehrenbreitzen; that of Bohemia, spreading from the Maine to the Neckar, and thence to the borders of the Black Forest (2).

The Germans have long connected heart-stirring associations with or the tier-man troops the sight, and even the name of the Rhine. The vast amplitheatre when they approached the Change of the central Alps, from the snows of which that noble stream the Rhane. takes its rise: the sublime cataract by which it descends into the takes its rise; the sublime cataract by which it descends into the plains of Germany; the ancient and peopled cities which lie along its banks; the romantic regions through whose precipices it afterwards flows; the fendal remains by which their summits are erowned; the interesting legends of the olden time with which they are connected; the vineyards which nestle in their snnny nooks; the topaz blaze of the cliffs on which the monldering rnins are placed-have long sunk into the heart of this imaginative people, and, united to the thrilling music of Haydn, have touched the immost chords of the German soul (5). They connected it, in an especial manner, with the idea of Germany as a whole; it was their great frontier stream; it recalled the days of their emperors and independence; it had become, as it were, the emblem of the fatherland. It may easily be conceived what effect upon the armies of a people thus excited-whose hearts had thrilled to the songs of Körner, whose swords had drunk of the blood of Leipsic-the sight of the Rhine, when it first burst upon their united and conquering arms, produced. Involuntarily the columns halted when they reached the heights beyond Hochheim, where its windings spread out as on a map beneath their feet; the rear ranks hurried to the front; the troops uncovered as they belield the stream of their fathers; tears trickled down many cheeks; joy, too big for utterance; swelled every heart; and the enthusiasm passing from rank to rank, soon a hundred thousand voices joined in the cheers which told the world that the war of independence was ended, and Germany delivered (4).

Nothing remained but to reap the fruits of this mighty victory, to thiow of the gather up the fragments of this prodigious spoil. Yet so wide was it Westphalfa. spread, so far had the French empire extended over Enrope, that to collect its ruins was a matter of no small time and labour. The giant was thrown down, but it was no easy undertaking to mease his limbs, and collect

⁽¹⁾ Vict. et Conq. ii. 161. Bout, 165, 166. (2) Vaud. i. 237. Bout. 167.

^{(3) &}quot;The Rhine! the Rhine! Be blessings on the Rhine!"
St.-Rochus bless the land of love and whie! "the national anthem, pointing to the anxious desire generally, felt, to reclaim from the spailer the Gerinan painted waves below;
Its rocks, whose topaz beam betrays the wine, Its locks, whose topaz beam betrays the wine, Or richer ruby glow.
The Rhine! the Rhine! be blessings on the Rhine!
Beats there a sad heart here? pour forth the wine!

⁽⁴⁾ Personal knowledge.

The following line, were added at this period to [&]quot;The Rhine shall no longer be our It is the great artery of the state, And it shall flow through the his armour. The rickely kingdom of Westphalia was the first of Napoleou's political creations which sunk to the dust, never again to rise. Jérôme, already almost dethroned by the incursion of Celternicheft, was finally swept away by the arms of Bernadotte Woronzow, with the advanced guard of his form, entered Cassel nine days after the battle of Leipsle, Jérôme had previously abandoned that capital, the greater part of his army joined the Alhies, and the few who remained faithful to his cause precipitately retired to Dusseldorf, where he crossed the Aline. He was closely followed by Winzingerode, who not only soon organized the whole kingdom of Westphalian the interest of the Villes, but overran and destrojed the revolutionary dynasty in the grand duchy of Perg, which united its arms to the common standards of Germany. The army of the Prince-Boyal, united to that of Bender 4.

spread every unannr sors : 1

Nor i were established in thit city, whole Winzingerode spread over the grand duchy of Oldenberg and Last I riesland, and hulow mirrehed to Winster, on his way to Holland, where the people were only waiting for like approach of the allied standards to throw off the I rench yoke, and declare their independence. Those Prissan corps, with their shoes and clothing entirely worn out by the profit cited and fatigning empagn they had madergone, were now in no condition to undertake any ulterior operation, but at this juncture; theral supply of clothing and every necessary arrived from Lugland, which at once restored their former efficiency, and for which they expressed the most unbounded gratitude (1)

Dayoust, who had been left in Hamburg with twenty-five thouyour an ine sand I rench, besides ten thousand Danes, presented a more important and a more difficult object of conquest. Hernadolle wisely determined to mute his forces to those of Walmoden, in order to ent nil the refreat, and secure the reduction, of this nowerful body of veteran troops, and with this view he broke up from Hanover on the 20th November, and marched by I unchurg to Botzenlerg on the Fibe, where he arrived four days afterwards, while Woronzow envested Harburg, and Strogonow moved against Stade. In attempt to take the latter town I'v escalade failed, but the French commander, fearing a ri petition of the attack, withdrew his forces across the I lbe, and joined the Dines at Cluckstadt. The Prince-Itoxal, now having collected forty thunsand men. prepared a general attack on Dissoust, who was in position behind the Stecknitz, but the French marshal, fearful of I cm, out off from than hirg, quitted that position during the or, ht, and retired behind the little. The effect of this retrograde movement was to separate entirely the I reach corps from the Danish anxiliaties, and the latter, foreseeing the perilons a redicament in which their allies would soon be place I, deemed it most expedient to detach themselves from their fortunes, and accordingly retired to bulleck. Thither they were immediately followed by the allied forces. The bunish commander, finding himself menace I with an assault which he was in no con lition to resist, proposed real itulation, which was accested, and I e was permitted to regain the bulk of the Panish forces at Segeber, while Davoust shut himself up in Hamburg, resolved to defend his post to the last extre-

The Danes after this retired towards their own country, followed Concluding operations Walmoden; but seeing that the allied general had imprudently exagainst the Danes, and tended himself too far, they gained an unforseen advantage over him. Three battalions of Danish infantry, with two regiments of cavalry, and six guns, having been vigorously charged by the Swedish horse, had laid down their arms; but the Swedish commander having imprudently left only a single squadron of hussars to guard so large a body of prisoners, they rose on their escort, and almost all escaped, leaving the guns alone in the hands of the Swedes. After this event, discreditable to both parties, 'the Danes retired in a body towards Kiel, pursued by Walmoden, who, in order to cut off their retreat, took post himself at Ostenrode with part of his forces, while the remainder pushed on after their line of retreat. The Danes, seeing their pursuers thus divided, quickly fell upon the corps at Ostenrode with ten thousand men, and defeated it with eonsiderable loss. The torrent of success, however, on the part of the Allies, was too violent to be arrested by such a casual check. Threatened by superior forces, the Danes shut themselves up in Rendsburg; Bernadotte advanced to Kiel; and the Allies, spread themselves over the whole of the south of Jutland. The Danish commander, seeing it was impossible to keep the field against such superior forces, and that the whole southern provinces of Denmark would speedily be overrun, entered into conferences with the Prince-Royal with a view to an armistice, and the adhesion of Denmark to the allied powers. On the 15th December an armistice was, accordingly, concluded, to endure for fifteen days only; but this led to negotiations with the cabinet of Copenhagen, which terminated in a peace between Denmark and the allied powers, which was signed on the 14th January and 8th February 1814; the particulars of which will afterwards be given. Meanwhile, the two fortresses of Gluckstadt and Friedricksort, near Hamburg, being excluded from the armistice, were besieged by the Swedish forces; and such activity did the Prince-Royal display in his operations, that the latter of these fortresses was compelled to surrender on the 19th December, with a hundred pieces of cannon and eight hundred prisoners (2).

Operations The principal attention of the Allies, however, after the battle of of St. Gyr and Tolstoy Leipsic, was drawn to the city of Dresden, where St.-Gyr, as already before Dresden. The direction of Wittenberg and Berlin. At that period, the only force left to observe the place was Count Tolstoy's, whose troops did not exceed twenty thousand men. Profiting by so considerable a superiority, St.-Cyr wisely resolved to make a sortie, and throw the enemy back upon the Bohemian frontier. Four divisions, accordingly, mustering among them oct 17 twenty thousand men, issued on the 17th October against Tolstoy, whose forces were for the most part new levies who had never seen fire. Two divisions of the French attacked the Russians in front, while two others assailed them in flank by the side of Plauen. With such skill was St.-Cyr's attack conceived, and with such vigour was it executed, that Tolstoy's men were broken at all points, and obliged to retire in disorder, which their great superiority in cavalry prevented from being converted into a flight; but, as it was, the loss they sustained amounted to twelve hundred prisoners, ten guns,

⁽¹⁾ Lond. 209, 210. Viet. et Conq. xxii. 163. See the Treatics in Martin's Sup. v. 673, 681. Bout. 170, 171.

(2) Bout. 173, 174. Vict. et Conq. xii. 163, 164.

(3) Ante, ix. 271.

and a bridge equipage, besides fifteen hundred killed and wounded. Disconon to certed by this cheek, Tolstoy hastened to regain the Bohemian frontier, of ter

works erected by the enemy to stratten the city had been demolished (1) the best being the common of the city and the state of the common of t regained possession of the open country. At the same time, the influx of stranglers, sick and wounded, left behind by the grand army on leaving the Fibe, continued unabated, all attempts to execute Napolcon's orders, by sending the maimed to Torgan, had failed, under circumstances of more than usual horror (5), and Dresden unencumbered with agonized and useless mouths, soon found itself beset by a double amount of enemies. No sooner was the battle of leapsie deeded, than Schwartzenberg, justly eager to secure so splendid a prize as the frint of his victory, detached klenau with his whole force to reinforce Tolstoy, who, in the mean time, had more than recruited his losses by drafts from Tophitz, and the other garrisons and dendes in the interior of Bohemia (1) Their troops, fully tifts thousand strong, effected a function on the 26th, and resumed the blockade na c of Presden on the day following, when St -Cyr, In no condition to keep the field against such superior forces, was obliged to shut himself up with a dejected army, and hardly any provisions

The condition of the trench murshal was now in the highest degree of the degree of the

(1) St. of vr lv 206 218 Vict et Conq 2218 178 F ut 1"7 1"8 Joan is 493 (2) St. of yr, is 202

And the state of t

(4) Marine 1 777 Page 1"5 That of Comp

peres I on t on unhappy over her to rever to the hospital. They preferred It of down in rows along the river neit to be to reschaest to get total total exhaustion of ammunition, the rapid desertion of all the German auxiliaries within the place, and the superior forces of the enemy before its walls, rendered it altogether impossible to attempt to make their way out by force of arms. During the whole of this period they were left without any orders, direct or indirect, from Napoleon, or any other intelligence than the rumours, vagne and exaggerated, which prevailed as to the disaster of Leipsic. Driven Nov. 6. to desperation, St.-Cyr endeavoured to make a sortie, with fifteen thousand men, by the right bank of the Elbe, in order to effect, if possible, a junction with the garrison of Targan or Wittenberg, and with their united force enta way across to the Rhine (1).

But the allied generals had information of his design, and were series and on the alert. General Wied Runkel met them with three thousand men on the 6th; and though the French were nearly five times superior in number, yet such was their physical externation from want, and moral depression from disaster, that they were unable to force their way through, and, after a slight combat were thrown back again into Dresden. This check and throwing back of months, proved fatal both to the spirits and resources of the garrison: discouragement became universal, escape seemed impossible, provisions of every sort were absolutely exhausted, discipline was dissolved by suffering; the miserable soldiers wandered about like spectres in the streets, or sank in woeful crowds into the hospitals (2); and at length, the French marshal, unable to prolong his defence, entered into a capitulation, in virtue of which the Allies gained possession of the town, and the French laid down their arms, on condition of being sent back to France, and not serving against the Allies till regularly exchanged. On the day following, the troops began to defile out of the town in six columns, and, after laying down their arms, proceeded on the road to France. The result showed the magnitude of the success which had been achieved, and the terrible disasters which were accumulating round Napoléon's empire since the catastrophe of Leipsic; for the number who surrendered were no less than thirty-two generals, seventeen hundred and ninety-five officers, and thirty-three thousand private soldiers, of whom twenty-five thousand were able to bear arms (5).

voured. The ravages which a contagious fever made on the inhalitants of the town, added to the public distress. Not less than three hundred were carried off by it a-week, among the citizens alone. Two hundred dead bodies were every day brought out of the military hospitals. Such was the accuundation in the churchyards, that the gravediggers could not inter them, and they were laid naked, in ghostly rows, along the place of sepulture. The bodies were heaped in such numbers on the dead carts, that frequently they fell from them, and the wheels gave a frightful sound in cracking the bones of the bodies which thus lay on the streets. The hospital attendants, and carters, tramphil down the corpses in the carts, like baggage or shaw, to make room for more; and, not infrequently, some of the bodies gave signs of life, and even emitted shricks under this larsh usage. Several of the hodies thrown into the Elbe for dead, were revived by the suilden immersion in cold water, and the wietches were seen struggling in vain with the waves, by which they were soon swallowed up. Medicines and hospital stores there were none; and almost all the surgeons and apothecaries were dead."- . Témoin oculaire. Odi Lybi , ii. 227, 238.

⁽¹⁾ St.-Cyr, iv. 217, 250. Hout. 177. Vaud. 211, 242.

<sup>242.

(2) &</sup>quot;Such was the fami bing condition of the French troops, that they pillaged for the twentieth time the neighbouring vincyards, and cut flesh off the limbs of the wounded horses lying by the wayside. In the interior of the town, misery had risen to the highest pitch. The mills were idle: there was neither grant to grind, nor water to turn the wheels. The bakers had shut up their shops, having no more bread to sell: a miserable crowd surrounded their doors, dem mding, with mingled threats and prayers, their accustomed supplies. Many of the poor had been for several days withmost bread; and, as the stock of butcher meat was also nearly expended, they were reduced to the most miserable shifts to support life. Nor were the French soldiers in any hetter situation: every day they killed thirty horses; and, instead of the accustomed ration of an onnee and a half of butcher meat, to which they had been long reduced, they got nothing but double the quantity of horse flesh, often so had that the soldiers could not cat it, even though pressed by the paugs of hunger. At last, however, famine overcame this repugnance, and the miserable wretches disputed with each other the balf putrid carcasses which they found in the streets, and soon their hones were laid bare, and the very tendons of the dead animals eagerly de-

⁽³⁾ St. Cyr, iv. 217, 257. Vict. et Comp. axii. 166, 167. Bont. 178.

T----The terms awarded to the French garrison were nearly the same the canin the capata are volated controllation of Mantita (1), and the Allies obtained possession, by the surrender, of no less than two hundred and forty meces of enterale cannon When the troops marched out, they afforded a melancholy proof of the degree to which the exactions of the Emperor had strained the physical resources of I rance, and his total disregard of the comforts or subsistence of his soldiers . for such was the weakness of the infantry, arising from youth, fatigue, and famine, that, by the admission of St.-Car himself, three fourths of them would have perished before they reached the Blune (2). Such as it Inth You berg and t surrender .

conducted as prisoners of war into the Austrian states, but that, if he was dissatisfied with these conditions, the troops would be replaced in Dresden in the same situation in which they were before the convention had been concluded. This offer, which was received by St. Cyr at Altenberg, on the road to I rance, the day following the contribation, was felt by him, as indeed it was equally by his opponents, to be perfectly clusory, as not only were the enemy now in Dresden, and had been there for seven days, but they had become acquainted with all its weak points, and in particular the absolute want of provisions to subsist a besieged garrison even for a single day rightly declined to accede, therefore, to the alternative offered of returning to Bresden, and being unable to make any resistance, preferred being condueted, with all his followers, as prisoners of war into Bohemia, londly protesting against this violation of the convention, as a breach of good frith and of the laws of war, which would one day recoil with fearful force on the heads of the parties who were guilty of it (5) reference. This refusal, on the part of the allied sovereigns, to ratify a con-on the vention concluded by the general in the full command of their arthis content times on the occasion, has excited, as well it infight, the most vehicment feelings of indignation among the French writers. There can be no doubt that it was to the last degree impolitie in klengu to have acceded to such a convention, when escape and subsistence were equally I evond the nower of the enemy, and when, by simply maintaining his position for t few days, without firing a shot, he must have connelled them to surrender at discretion. It is equally certain that, even if half the garrison reached the Rhine, they would have proved no small acquisition to Appoleon, whose greatest weakness was now likely to arise from the want of experienced soldiers, and whose necessities might render limitable scrapplons in his aitherence to the treaty, as to their not serving again till exchanged. Put all these considerations are reasons why the capitulation should never have been entered into they afford none to sindicite its violation. Schwartzenberg might have debarred his hentenants from entering into any capitulation, I ut he had not done so klenau had full powers, and the convention, upon the faith of which the French had delivered up Dresden, surrendered their guns and laid down their arms, was clearly within his powers and province as the general commanding the siege, and was absolute, without any condition or suf-

⁽¹⁾ In a 1 M. (* 1) He can be supported by the surface for the surface of the supported by tion tilburgers e o ut 2 la v cite d a anasterat of other security date for months, at Languise has the &

au eto maneo estpa enga nee beat et fu Kh e " and the manuscratified regis nection for the home manuscratified in the district of the state o

pensive clause. In these circumstances, it was unquestionably obligatory upon the honour of the victors, who are bound, by the most sacred of all ties, to respeet the rights of those who are in their power and have become incapable of making any further resistance. Justice in such a case can admit of no equivoeation, derived even from the most pressing reasons of expediency. Honour regards all treaties with the vanguished as debts which must be paid. The proposal to reinstate St.-Cyr in the Saxon capital, after its defences and total want of provisions had become known, and his own troops were far advanced on the road to the Rhine, though the best that could be done next to observing the convention, was plainly an offer such as the French garrison neither could, nor were bound to accept. In violating this convention, the allied sovereigns did not imitate the honourable fidelity with which Napoléon observed the conditions of the capitulation of Mantua, granted to Wurmser in 4796 (1); but rather took a model from the cordial approbation which he gave to the unworthy fraud by which the bridge of the Danube was surprised in 1805 (2), or the express example which he had set of disavowing an armistice, in his own refusal to ratify that of Treviso, concluded in 1801 by his lieutenant Brune (5). Condemning equally such deviations from the path of honour by all parties engaged in the contest, it is with pride and gratitude that the English historian must refer to the conduct of his own country on occasion of a similar crisis; and when he recollects that the convention of Cintra. though unanimously condemned by the English people, was executed, on the admission of their opponents themselves, with scrupulous fidelity by the British government (4), he must admit that such an honourable distinction was cheaply purchased by all the advantages which its faithful observance gave to the enemy (5).

The interest excited by the refusal, on the part of the allied so-Lord Londonderry prevents a vereigns, to ratify the convention of Dresden, was, however, atsimilar capi-tended with one good effect, in preventing a similar political misbeing granted to Dayoust. take in the case of Marshal Davoust and the garrison of Hamburg. Bernadotte, who had now assumed the command in chief in that quarter, was far from evincing the same activity and vigour in his operations against the important French army shut up in that city, which he had displayed in bringing to a conclusion hostilities with the ancient rivals of Sweden—the Danes. On the contrary, he had at this period entered into negotiations with the French marshal, the object of which was, that, upon condition of surrendering Hamburg and the adjacent forts, he was to be permitted to retire to France with all his forces. He, in the first instance, had promised Sir Charles Stewart that he would not enter into such a capitulation without his consent; but no sooner had the former been called to Frankfort, to attend on behalf of England the conferences of the allied powers, than he sent express instructions to Walmoden to bring about a convention of such a character with Davoust. But this equivocal step did not escape the vigilant eye of the English military plenipotentiary, who no sooner received intelligence of what was in agitation, than he dispatched such energetic remonstrances against the proposed measure, that the Prince-Royal was obliged to abandon it (6). And thus the same eminent and patriotic officer, who, by his

⁽¹⁾ Ante, iii. 56. (2) Ante, v. 218.

⁽³⁾ Ante, iv. 213.
(4) "The convention of Cintra, though condemned by public opinion in England, was executed with honourable fidelity by the English government,"-

For, iv. 356. "Look at England. She condemned the convention of Cintra, but did not the less execute its provisions with scrupulous faith."—

⁽⁵⁾ Ante, vi. 370. (6) "I trust your Royal High moral courage on the eve of the battle of Leipsic, had gained for the Allies the decisive advantage of bringing the Prince-Royal's army up to the charge on that eventful day, now rendered to his country, the not less important service of preventing a capitulation, which, by restoring twenty-five thousand veteran troops to the standards of Aapoldon, might have cutirely chanced the fate of the war next soring in France (4).

The fall of Dresden was shortly after followed by that of the cluef former other fortreese on the Oder and the Vistula On the 21st November, Stettin, which had been closely blockaded for eight months, and the garrison of which lad exhausted their last means of subsistence, surrendered the troops, still eight thousand strong, were made prisoners of war, and three hundred and fifty guns on the walls and in the magazines fell into the hands of the Allies, who shortly after dispatched the blockaling force to re-inforce the corps of Taumzen, to which it belonged by the first hundred buttle troops, we entered the ranks of the Allies and the top with the event of the corps of the recourse 0 . .. the 1st November the investiture was completed, and the frenches opened on the 22d The approaches of the besiegers were proceeding rapidly. when an armistice was agreed to on the 28th, with a view to arranging the ferms of a capitulation. When the I rench commander, however, discovered that an unconditional surrender was required, he broke off the conferences, and hostilities were resumed. They were not, however, of lour duration luserse, more terrible than the sword of the enemy, was making the most unheard-of ravages within the walls. Typhus fever, the well known and never failing attendant on human suffering, was daily carrying off the garrison by hundreds, while thousands encumbered those awful dens of misery, the military hospitals. Decimated by death, extenuated by suffering, the garrison were in no condition to maintain the place against the Impetuous and repeated attacks of the Albes After a fortnight of open trenches, the outworks were carried by assault, and the rampart seriously shaken by the fire of the besiegers' artiflery, and the governor Dutaillis, fuiding the troops under his command meanable of manning the works, from the extraordinary ravages of fever, was obliged to surrender at discretion Including the sick in the hospitals, the number who were exptured was ten thousand, the poor remains of eighteen thousand who had sought refuge there after the retreat of the grand army from the I fle, but such was the danger of contagion in that great (est house, that the Alberdid not venture to enter the fortress till the 10th of January, in Torgati was

Torgau was not long in following the example of Stettin, although

titi

nucled etreferentists will permit me to express the sea smeats of bered En a m on a mil tary question in which is must feel the despect laterers. To all appearance locations his now in his and Manchil Darmit is your. Should be everyone by prince

A close to asserted life of your glory of your prevail laters, that I as the lot y Is "I as not for the explaint of my country. It is with the most later as that I have recently hered executed the asserted the so asserted to be asserted to the asserted t taken the whole reserve park of the grand army, the want of which had been so severely felt at the close of the battle of Leipsic, and two hundred and eighty-seven guns; but these advantages were dearly purchased by the terrible epidemic which, issuing from its woe-struck walls, made the circuit, in the following years, of every country of Europe, until among the Venetian paupers in 1816, and Irish poor in 1817, it encountered a starving population, where, amidst equal suffering, it swept away numbers proportionally greater into the common charnel-house of mortality (1).

^{(1 100) 210 211} (2) Emi 417 Tat et Cong 214 117

During the course of this terrible struggle on the Elbe, the for-Operations tresses on the Vistula, still remaining in the hands of the French, before Dantzic duling 1813. have almost escaped observation; but the time was now approaching when their defence, after a siege or blockade of nearly twelve months. could no longer be prolonged. Rapp, as already mentioned, had done every thing which firm resolution and rigorous discipline could effect, to restore order among the motley group of five-and-thirty thousand men, who had taken refuge in Dantzic after the Moscow retreat; and in some degree he had succeeded. Disease, however, as usual after all these disastrous retreats, soon began to make ravages in the interior of its walls, and before the end of January 1815, six thousand were in hospital. The garrison, however, was still so powerful that the Russian blockading force, which was of not greater strength, and composed chiefly of landwehr, was unable to confine it within the circuit of the walls; and in the course of January and February several severe actions took place, with various success, but withrcb 6. out the besiegers being able to complete the investment. Early in March, the Russians, being reinforced by the troops who had successfully terminated the blockade of Pillau, amounting to six thousand men, made a vigorous attack on the fortified posts held by the French in advance of the city, particularly Langenfurth, Stotzenberg, and D'Ohra; but they were repulsed after a severe action, with the loss of lifteen hundred men. Encouraged by this success, Rapp shortly after made a sortie to collect subsistence, which was beginning to fail, in which he in a great measure succeeded, and made himself master of an hospital of the enemy, containing several hundred sick and wounded (2).

Operations Disease, however, now came to the aid of the Allies; and the active till the commence cumulation of so many troops—some of them bringing the seeds of ment of the contagion with their columns into the fortress—began to produce 10 October. The most fatal ravages. In the end of April, the health of the garrison having been in some degree restored, a sortic was hazarded into the island of Nehrung, the fertility and agricultural riches of which promised to afford considerable resources for the garrison. The Russians, three thousand strong, tried to stop the columns, but they were defeated with heavy loss, and the French advanced eight leagues along the island, making spoil of all its provisions, and bringing back grain in abundance to the fortress, besides five hundred head of cattle. In the course of May, however, the besieging army received considerable reinforcements from the interior of Russia, and the adjoining provinces of Prussia; and in the beginning of June, the Duke of Wirtemberg, who had assumed the command, had thirty thousand com-

⁽¹⁾ Viet, et Conq. xxii. 168 Bout. 186.

The author witnessed the poor of Venice labouring under this epidemic in 1816, and the Irish prostrated by its ravages in 1817. The imagination of Dante himself never conceived any thing so terrible as the scenes of woe then exhibited under that frightful scourge—the sad bequest to humanity of the ambition of the wars of Napoleon.

⁽²⁾ Vict, et Conq. xxii. 169, 171. Vaud. i. 244, 245. Bont. 179.

batants under his hanners. Yet potnithstanding this, ltann, on the 1---Oth June, again made a sortic at the head of fifteen thousand men; and although defeated at some points, he speceded in bringing considerable stores of foregree and growing racinto the fortress. In this affair, both parties lost about thele hundred men. Hostilities were soon after terminated by the armistice of Plesmitz, and not again resumed tell the end of August -the fortress, in the intermediate period, having been revietabled every live days, by mutual commissioners appointed for that purpose, in terms of the convention. The armistice terminated on the 28th, and several obviouse conflicts took place, on the following morning, at the advanced nosts: in the course of which, though success was balanced, the besiegers sensibly grand ground, and contracted the circle within which the nosts of the hebest to a series of were confined. During the whole of September repeated sortios were made by the garrison, some of which were successful and others defeated: but the besieged, after a most honourable resistance, were at length thrown back, at all points, into the fortress; and the Duke of Wirtembers having received considerable reinforcements, and a regular battering train having arrived, operations in form commenced in the lirst week of October (1).

The bombardment commenced on the 8th, before the breaching sign and batteries were ready, or any impression had been made even upon the external works of the place. With such vigour was the lire in several places, During the principal attack was and the redoubts which covered it; and, after a vigorous cannonade for some days, the rines in the place, both of provisions and clothing, were consumed; and, notwithstanding the extent of their supplies, provisions began to grow scarre. The body of the place, however, was still uninjured; the rampart was unshaken, and the firm spirit of Rapp could not brook the idea of submission. In the beginning of November, however, the regular siege commenced, and parallels were began to be run with great vigour; and, although the approaches of the besiegers were sensibly retarded by the heroic exploits of a small corns of volunteers, who more than once carried terror and conflagration into the centre of the besiegers' lines, yet their progress was raind and alarming; all the external works of the place fell successively into the enemy's hands; a misal officer, who was dispatched to make the Emperor acquainted with the distressed state of the garrison, was anable, after the most heroic efforts, to penetrate further than Copenhagen; desertion was taking place to an alarming extent, and all hopes of being rehesed having vanished with the hattle of Legiste, Rapp at length consented to capitulate; stipulating, however, that the garrison should be permitted to retire to France, on condition of not serving again till exchanged, The garrison still consisted of sixteen thousand men, of whom about one half were French, and the remainder Germans and Poles. By the capitalisms, it was provided that the ratification of the Emperor of flussia should be obtained; and he having refused to sanction the condition relative to the return of the garrison to France, the same offer was made to them as had been made to St.-Cyr, that they should be reinstated in the fortress in the same position in which they were before they left it. This was strictly legal in this case, as the sanction of the Emperor had been expressly stipulated for in the convention; and as it was not agreed to, Rapp and the French were conducted as prisoners of war into Russia, but almost all the auxiliaries immediately entered the allied ranks (1).

The lesser places still held by France on the Vistula, having exhausted their last means of subsistence, surrendered shortly after. The garrison of Zamosc, three thousand strong, capitulated on the 22d Dccember; that of Moldin, with twelve hundred men, three days after; so that the tricolor flag no longer waved to the eastward of the Oder. About the same time General Dalton, who commanded the French garrison in Erfurth, finding himself not sufficiently strong to defend the wide circuit of the walls, retired into the citadel of St.-Petersberg, on the rocky summit of which he still maintained his post when the city was surrendered by capi-Jan. 6, 1814 tulation in the beginning of January. At the close of the campaign, France retained only, of her immense possessions beyond the Rhine, the places of Hamburg, Magdeburg, and Wittenberg, on the Elbe; Custrin and Glogau on the Oder; and the citadels of Erfurth and Wurtzhurg. All the rest of the places garrisoned or influenced by her arms, had been swept away; the Confederation of the Rhine was dissolved, and its forces marching under the allied banners; and refluent over the bridges of Mayence, eighty thousand men, with two hundred guns, sad and dejected, had retired into Francethe poor remains of four hundred thousand combatants, with twelve hundred cannons, who, three months before, still held the scales of fortune equal on the banks of the Elbe. The contest in Germany was over; French domination beyond the Rhine was at an end; thirty thousand prisoners taken on the field, and eighty thousand since surrendered in garrison, constituted the proud trophies of the battle of Leipsic (2).

Insurrection The universal fermentation produced in Europe by the delim Holland verance of Germany, was not long of spreading to the Dutch Pro-VINCES. The yoke of Napoléon, universally grievous from the enormous pecuniary exactions with which it was attended, and the wasting military conscriptions to which it immediately led, had been in a peculiar manner felt as oppressive in Holland, from the maritime and commercial habits of the people, and the total stoppage of all their sources of industry, which the maritime war and long continued blockade of their coasts had occasioned. They had tasted for nearly twenty years of the last drop of humiliation in the cup of the vanquished—that of heing compelled themselves to aid in upholding the system which was exterminating their resources, and to purchase with the blood of their children the ruin of their country. These feelings, which had for years existed in such intensity as to have rendered revolt inevitable, but for the evident hopelessness at all former times of the attempt, could no longer be restrained after the battle of Leipsic had thrown down the colossus of French external power, and the approach of the allied standards to their frontiers had opened to the people the means of salvation. From the Hanse Towns the flame of independence spread to the nearest cities of the old United Provinces; and the small number of French troops in the country at once encouraged revolt and paved the way for external aid. At this period, the whole troops which Napoléon had in Holland did not exceed six thensand French, and two regiments of Germans, mon whose fidelity to their colours little reliance could be placed. Upon the approach of the albed troops under Bulow, who advanced by the road of Munster, and Wagingerode, who soon followed from the same quarter, the donaniers all withdrew from the coast, the garrison of Amsterdam retired, and the whole disposable force of the country was concentrated at Efrecht, to form a corps of observation, and act according to circumstances. This was the signal for a general revolt At Amsterdam, the troops were no sooner roug than the inhabitants rose in insurrection, deposed the Imperial authorities, horsted the orange flag, and established a provisional government, with a view to the re-establishment of the ancient order of things, yet not violently or with crucity, but with the calmness and composure which attest the exercise of social rights by a neople long habituated to their enjoyment (1). The same change took place. at the same time and in the same orderly manner, at Rotterdain, Dortreelit, Delft, Leyden, Barlem, and the otler chief town, the people every where, amidst cries of " Orange Bosent" and universal rapture, mounted the orange cockade, and reinstated the ancient authorities, and after twenty years of foreign domination and suffering, the glorious spectacle was exhibited, of a people peaceably regaining their independence, and not shedding a drop of blood, and, without citier passion or vengeance, reverting to the institutions of former times (2)

⁽¹⁾ Dartois, Siege de Dantzie, 12, 115. Vaud. i. (2) Vaud. i. 247. Vict, et Conq. xxii. 180, 18 246. Join, iv. 491. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 182, 185. Bout. 180, 181.

376

Military and political consequences of the highest importance, imthe state of the s Prince Regent of Ingland and the Prince of Orange, in London, the latter shortly after embarked on board on l'nglish line of hattleship, the Warrior, and on the 27th landed at Scheveling, from whenre he proceeded to the lingue Meantime the French troops and coast-guards, who covered from their consternation, and made a general forward movement ogainst Amsterdam Before they got there, however, a body of three hundred Cossacks had reached that capital, where they were received with enthusia-tic joy and this advanced guard was soon after followed by t eneral Benkendorf's brigade, which, after travelling by jost from /woll to Harderwik, embarked at the latter place, and, by the aid of a favourable wind, reached Amsterdam on the 1st December. The Ity slan general immediately advanced against the forts of Mayder and Halfweg, of which he made bimself master, taking twenty pieces of carnon and six han fred prisoners, while on the eastern frontier, beneral On en, with Bul aw's advanced guards, corned Dornbourg by assault on the 25d. and advancing against Arnheim, threw the garrison, three thou sand strong,

A Capel & 221 2.2 Vinter Comp. vs. 124 35 No. 121 323 Acc Per 131 140 361 373 Acc Per 131 140 361 374 375 Acc Per 131 140 361 375 Acc Per 131 140 361 375 Acc Per 131 140 375 Acc Per 131

a disso gentionalized one with torbeland g or no take has and hope well recomg or no twice his a tell hope over freedom this na not huntrelighty. We proceed the twinter Known family or his overeith many time a group of the per he will call to his a dip of graphen gather attention of interespects for so sy year early earst east amile I fhallen Do en true france; hanks to find a litere & . Part and their observe and of our to $ 7 $

which strove to prevent the place being invested, with great loss back into the town. Next day, Bulow himself came up with the main strength of his corps, and, as the ditches were still dry, hazarded an esea-Nov. 30 lade, which proved entirely successful; the greater part of the garrison retiring to Nimeguen, by the bridge of the Rhine. The French troops, finding themselves thus threatened on all sides, withdrew altogether from Holland; the fleet at the Texel hoisted the orange flag, with the exception of Admiral Verliuel, who, with a body of marines that still proved faithful to Napoléon, threw himself with honourable fidelity into the fort of the Texel. Amsterdam, amidst transports of enthusiasm, received the beloved representative of the House of Orange. Before the close of the year, the tricolor flag floated only on Bergen-op-zoom and a few on the southern frontier fortresses: and Europe beheld the prodigy of the seat of war having been transferred in a single year from the banks of the Niemen to those of the Scheldt (1).

To complete the picture of this memorable year, there only remains in Italy during this to give a sketch of the Italian campaign, and of the operations of Wellington in the Spanish peninsula. The former can be but a sketch, for the operations of the opposite armies, though numerous and complicated, led to no material result; and it was on the fields of Leipsic and Vittoria that the fate of the French empire was decided, and on which the broad light of history requires to be thrown. Yet the narrative, how brief soever, will not be without its interest; for it will recall the memory of other days, when the fortunes of the young Republic played around the bayonets of Napoléon's grenadiers; and, after a long sojourn amidst the rough sounds of the German regions, there is a charm in the sweet accents of the Italian tongue.

Eugène Beauharnais, as already mentioned, retired from the grand dispositions army in Germany when Napoléon took the command, and he arrived sures for the at Milan on the 18th of May. His first care was to organize an army Lombardy. in Lombardy, which might put him in a condition to inspire feelings of apprehension in the cabinet of Vienna, or resist any attempt which it might make to recover, by force of arms, its lost and long-coveted possessions in Italy. Napoléon, by a decree, early in May entrusted the formation of the new army of Italy to his Viecroy, and it was to be composed entirely of native soldiers, or conscripts from the French departments adjoining the Alps. Though this ordinance bespoke strongly the confidence of the Emperor in his Italian subjects, and might be supposed to increase the patriotic spirit which was developed in the north of Italy, yet it was attended with one obvious danger, which came to tell with signal severity upon the fortunes of the empire in its last moments,—that these soldiers were bound by no tie to the tramontane regions, and might be expected all to desert if the fortunes of war should compel the French eagles to retire across the Alps. When the Viceroy returned to Italy, he found only the skeletons of a few regiments, and three hundred officers and non-commissioned officers, who had been forwarded by post from Spain-the whole forces of the kingdom of Italy had perished in Russia, or been marched to the Elbe: but his energy and activity overcame every difficulty; and, by the beginning of July, fifty-two thousand men were in arms, of whom forty-five thousand infantry, and lifteen hundred horse, were present with the eagles (2).

(2) Vignolles, Precis des Opér, des Arm, d'Italie

en 1813, 1814, 9, 12. Vict. et Cor Norvius, Portf. de 1813, ii. 464, 4

⁽¹⁾ Ann. Reg. 1313. 161, 162. Bout. 175, 176. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 165.

226

rust

tuctel in On the other side, the Austrians were not idle. Farly in July a forter and respectable force was collected on the frontiers of illyria, under the owlers of Field marshal Hiller, and, before the end of the month, it was raised to seven divisions, mustering full fifty thousand combatants, of a description much superior to the Italian conserints. In addition to this, they raised the landwehr of Illyria and Croatia, and, reinforced by several thousands of these hardy mountaineers, commenced the campaign the moment of the spoils which France had won from the hereditary states

รับการ mainder of the army, under Verdier, Marcognet, Gratian, and Palombini, stretched by the left by Palma Augya to the blood-stained heights of Turvis and Villach occupying thus the whole eastern passes from Italy into Germany (1) Hiller's force, directly in front, extended from apposite Villacli on his right to Agram on his left, where he had concentrated two divisions, and the ferment in the provinces of Croatia, coded to France, already promised the most favourable recention to the Austrians, if they myaded that nortion

The Austrians being the stronger parts, were the first to comtriant com mence hostilities. On the 17th, two columns passed the frontier eng to u tambe ta house (ne stream of the Save at Agram, and directed their march lowards harlstadt and Firme General Jeannin, who commanded in that able sec quarter, at first made preparations for resistance, but finding himeturs.

self speedily surrounded by on insurrection, which broke out on oll-ules at the right of the much-loved Austrian standards, he was obliged to aliandon the first city and fall back on the second. This retrograde movement threw the whole illyrian provinces into a blaze all Croatia was soon in Insurrection , the flame suread along the Dalmatian shore, and, as far as the mouths of the Cattaro, the whole mountaineers were soon in orms to throw off the voke of France. This vehicment challition, coupled with the numerical inferiority of Fugene, who found himself assailed by above fifty thousand German troops, for whom his newly-raised Italians were no adequate match, rendered It impossible for him to maintain his ground along the whole frontier, and in consequence, abandoning I name and the whole coast of filly ria, he ascended with the bulk of his forces the course of the Isonzo, and took post in the hitrenched camp at Tarvis, hopling to make good the passes till time was afforded for the armaments to be completed in his rear Meanwhile Villach had been evacuated by the Italian troops, but no sooner did I uge ne's Asr m reinforcement arrive in that direction than it was retaken by three I renchibattations again it was carried by the Austrians, and hardly graned by Fug ne, who established his headquarters in that city. But these oderntages were obtained by dennding the right and maritime provinces, and finine was occupied by the Austrians under General Augent, without 101 74 opposition, in the end of August (2) tin the 20th of August General Pino ottacked the Austrian lutrenchthe gain. ments on Mont Leobel, but the Italians failed entirely against that formidable bulwark, and were thrown back in utter disorder ou * PER ANE brainburg I ugene I rought them back to the charge in greater force, and the Austrians were drive i out. The design of Hiller at Sect. 0 this period was to have forced the enemy to evacuate the passes In his front In the Julian Alps, and retire behir I the line of the Bonro, and with that for the a fine one of the 150 for it has been (1) hipsoft a 19 21 het at Coung un 111 Turing the de 1113 for 1

view, after the loss of Villach, he had fortified Fiestritz, from which point he could at pleasure either menace Tarvis or turn and descend the valley of the Upper Save. To frustrate this design, Engène directed an attack on this fortified post, and after a sharp combat, Grenier, who commanded the assailants, carried it, with a loss to the enemy of eight hundred men. Enconraged by this success, the Viceroy made a general attack on the enemy's positions at all points. He met, however, with a severe check at Kaplafas, on his right, where General Belotti, with a brigade, was totally defeated, with a loss of twelve hundred men; and his right wing, disconcerted by this disaster, fell back, closely pursued by the Austrians, towards Trieste, while the insurrection in their favour spread over the whole of Istria. The Viceroy was obliged, therefore, to remain on the defensive; but, like a skilfol general, he turned it to the best advantage. Observing that Hiller had directed the weight of his forces to the sea-coast on his left, to follow up his successes in the direction of Trieste, he moved in the same direction, and succeeded, after several actions, in expelling the enemy from Finne, where General Pino established himself. So sudden was this attack, that the Archduke Maximilian, who was in the town at the time, with difficulty saved himself on board Admiral Freemantle's vessel (1).

The Process These balanced successes on either side led to no decisive result, hack into and, after a month's active hostilities, the position of the contending parties was not materially different from what it had been at their commencement. But events were now on the wing which gave a decisive advantage to the Austrians, and threw back the Italian army behind the Adige. Large reinforcements, chiefly from the landwehr of the adjoining provinces, reached Hiller in the middle of September; he passed Sept. 21. the Drave on the 19th of that month, and soon gained considerable Sept. 25 advantages over the divisions of Grenier and Verdier, on the French left in the Julian Alps. The object of this transference of active operations from the Austrian left on the sea-coast, to their right in the mountains, was suon apparent; the treaty of Ried, between the cabinet of Vienna and that of Mnnich, secured the accession of Bavaria to the alliance-again put the House of Hapsburg in possession of the great central fortress of the Tyrol, and enabled the enemy to turn the Italian valleys by their upper extremity, amidst the Alpine snows. Hiller was not slow in turning to the best account this signal advantage. Directing a considerable part of his force up the valley of the Drave, which entered Tyrol by Princeken, and moving forward towards the vallel of the Adige, by the bridge of Laditch, Brixen, and the scenery immortalized in the Tyrolese war (2), he himself remained in the centre to force the fortified posts held by the enemy at Tarvis. A vigorous attack was made by Hiller in person on the position of Tarvis, from which, after several obstinate conflicts, the Vicerov was at length driven with great loss. Despairing now of maintaining his ground in the Oct. 17. hills, Engene withdrew his troops, not without considerable diffi-Oct. 13. culty, down all the valleys, abandoning altogether the erest of the mountains, and concentrated them on the banks of the Tagliamento, at the entrance of the plain of Frinli; while, by a decree from Gorizia, he directed the levy of fifteen thousand additional conscripts, to supply the loss of an equal number who had perished by fatigue, sickness, or the sword, during this consuming warfare of posts in the Alps (5).

⁽¹⁾ Norvins, Port. de 1813. ii. 467. Viet. et Conq. xxii. 203, 204. Vignolles, 24, 36. (2) Ante, vii. 198.

⁽³⁾ Jom. iv. 497. Vict et Conq. xxii. 200-014.

330

The retreat, once commenced, could not readily be terminated Canana the west at the Encouraged by the accession of Bayaria, and the enthosiastic suneminitalise port of the Tyrolese, who crowded with shouls of nov to their stans learn dards, the Austrians pressed evers where on their retiring columns and it was soon evident that the line of the Adice was the only one where a stand could be made. In contemplation of that event the garrison of Palina Augya was strengthened by three battalions, that of Venice augmented to twelve thousand men, while, to delay as long as nossible the discouragement and disaffection which he was well aware the retreat of the army would produce in Italy, the Viceros determined to munitaln to the last extremity the line of the Isonzo , and so long was the circuit which the troops required to make by Brixen and Trent, that he was not without hones that the new levies might be brought forward before the enems threatened Veron: But so rapid was the march of events, that this was soon found to be impossible On the 25th Sentember, rolleed, General Giffeoga, with an Italian division, had gained some advantages over the chemy, and re-occupied Brixen, but the hourly increasing strength of the Germins. whose columns were now as amented his a vast concourse of volunteers from all parts of Tyrol, soon compelled him to evacuate that town, and Oct 18 retreat successively by Bolzano and Layis to Trent. The latter lown was next day expended, and its easile invested by the victorious Austrians. while the dissurited Italians retired to Tolano, and the famous defiles of the Adige above Verona Eugloe finding his rear thus threatened, felt that the line of the Isonzo was no longer tenable. Throwing garrisons, therefore, Into a few forts as he retired rapidly across the Taghamento, and after sustaining a severe defeat on the part of one of his divisions at St -Daniel, ho arrived on the 20th at Sprozimo on the Pince Menwhile a bloody combat took place at Volume, which, after a gallant resistance, was carried by the Austrians, the Italians falling back to the still stronger and wellknown position at the entrance of the mass of Serravalle. Here they were attacked next day the Italian troops, now thoroughly discouraged, made a very feeble resistance, an I were driven, in utter disorder, to the platent of 0-1 11 Pivoli The recollection of Vanoléon's clory was unable to arrest, even for a day, on this memorable snot the rapidity of his fall, Biroh was abandoned almost as soon as It had been occupied, and the enemy were driven lack out of the bills to the very gates of Verona (1), while two days after the citadel of Trent, alter a short but active siege, surreoilered with its garrison of five lundred men f seletar. This skitful or cration of Hiller in turning the French line of defence on the Prive by the innuntries, rendered a further retreat indispensible, and soon I rought their strodards in the plain back to the Ada To cover this retrogra k movement, which was connently hazardons in the level country, in presence of a suj erur and victorious enemy, the Viceros on the "list roale a vizorous attack on Bassago, which had falled into the ban is of the Sustrians, and the situation of which, at the entrace of the Val Sugary and the d Hes of the Pri its, promised to secure the army from molestrit in on the side where most clanger was to be apprehemded, and corried the place with a loss to the Austrians of eacht hun level men Thus scented, the Italian army continued its retrest across the plane from the thave to the tilling, while the gran I 1 3th of artillers was directed F-- 4 to Vallegio and l'adua. On the 4th Angember the Amerov's headquarters were established at Verona; the garrisons were withdrawn from Bassano, and all the posts to the eastward of that city; and the campaign which had been begun on the Niemen and the vistula, terminated on the Rhine and the Adige (1).

The withdrayal of the Italian troops, however, behind this river, Surrender of Trieste and conproved fatal to the French power on the whole eastern shores of the Adriatic. General Nugent, with the left wing of the Austrian army, speedily overran the shores of the gulf of Trieste, and invested that city in the middle of October. The operations, powerfully aided by an English squadron and auxiliary force from Sicily, were pushed with uncommon vigour; an important outwork, called the Old Powder Magazine, was carried by assault by the combined British and Austrian forces on the 22d, and the breaching batteries being then established, a most vigorous fire was kept up on the citidel, which soon produced such an effect that the works were entirely ruined, and the place being no longer tenable, surrendered at discretion on the 51st, with twelve hundred men, and very valuable magazines. Nor were the Allies less successful in Dalmatia, where the Anstrian troops, powerfully assisted by an insurrection of the inliabitants on the one side, and the British marines on the other, speedily overcame every resistance: so early as the middle of October, they were masters of all the forts at the mouths of the Cattan; a fortnight after, the town of Knin was taken by assault; soon after, the garrison of Sebenico revolted; and surrendered it to the Austrians; Spalatro was taken the same day, and the entire reduction of the province and eastern shores of the Adriatic effected, by the reduction of the strong fortress of Zara, which capitulated, after a severe cannonade of thirteen days, to the Dec. 9. combined Austrian and British forces on the 9th December. Meanwhile Palma Nuova was besieged, and Venice invested; and although the strength of the garrison of the latter, which, including the marine forces, was twelve thousand strong, and the magnitude of the flotilla, mounting above three hundred guns, which defended the lagunæ and approaches to the queen of the Adriatic, rendered its deduction a matter of time and difficulty. Yet the whole continental possessions of the old Republic, as far as the Adige, were occupied by the Austrians, whose forces extended to Ferrara and the banks of the Po (2).

Reflections on this cam. The memorable campaign in central Europe of 1815, the most fruitful in great events, and the most momentous in its consequences, which had occurred in the annals of mankind. The armies of Cæsar or Scipio would have formed mere corps d'armée in its vast array; the forces of Tamerlane or Genghis-khan would have been blown to atoms by a few discharges of its stupendous artillery. Disciplined skill neither appeared there in miniature array, as in the Grecian republics, nor barbarian valour under the guidance of unskilled energy, as in the hosts of Bajazet or Attila. Civilization and knowledge had exhausted their resources for the contest; ambition poured forth the accumulations of ages for its support; barbaric valour strained the energy of the desert for the interests it involved. The last reserves, the arriere ban of Europe and Asia, were engaged in the struggle: on the field of bettle, beside the Tartars and Bashkirs of the East, were to be seen the tender youth of Europe, only recently torn from the embraces of maternal love: in its maintenance were exhausted all that the military force of France could extert of wealth from the present sufferinge of continental Europe, and all that the industry of England had accumulated of credit during past centuries of pacific exertion. Nor were the still and science of the leaders in this memorable struggle inferior to the producious forces they were called to command, or the vital interests for which they contended: the genius of Napoléon, equal to that of Casar or Hannibal, all but overhalanced the heroism of Alexander and the science of Gneisenan, which may fairly be placed beside that of Scipio or Enaminondas; and the cause for which they contended was not the conquest of provinces or the plunder of cities. but the liberation of the human race from unbearable oppression or the establishment of universal dominion upon an immorable foundation

ict. et C

Great as were the disasters which attended Napolion in the course of this memorable campaign, and rapid the fall which his abd it during the course of this memoranie campaign, and rapid doubted whether hypotenia power made during its continuance, it may be doubted whether allibrates and appears allibrate. he ever, on any previous occasion, displayed greater abilities. either in the general concention of his designs, or in their rapid and algorous execution. His system of strategy was the same as it had been at Austerlitz and Jena; and, if it led to very different results, it was only because he was now opposed in a totally different manner, and resisted with a spirit commensurate to the attack. The ceneral ideas for the conduct of the came 1 . . .

and and the of same of all all and an algo I film he could not have done better; that it was the last defensible position in which the empire of Germany could be maintained: that a retreat in the Rhine, though with undiminished forces, would immediately have been attended by the defection of all the states of the Rheulsh confederacy and that the risks were well worth incurring, which retained one half of Enrone to his standards (1).

The Add of H Nanoleon's Co this carrier this campaign.

332

more unqualifi which he took advantage of his central position on the Elbe, to defeat the formidable assault of the allied sovereigns on Dresden, was equalled by the felicitous conception of an attack next day on both wings of his onnonents : a measure unlike his ordinary tactics, unlooked for by them, and therefore the more likely to meet with decisive success. Though overwhelmed by superior numbers, and a moral energy which nothing could resist, at Leipsie, the gallantry of his resistance—the heroism of his troops, are worthy of the most unreserved admiration : the more so, that they wanted the stimulus of hone. the recollection of success, and that they fought, at least on the second day, with the mournful conviction that all was lost. Much as we may admire the redoubtable conqueror who struck down his apponents with his from grantlet at Austerlitz and Jeas, there was as much vigour and resolution displayed on the field of Bautren, or under the walls of Bresden; the central charge at most fin, behald entrety total history el al the d'eret communat one of the direct a" of arrow, and put hire to a a section to a fit atend poof my fel a materiers they in the fit late to lent them in detail,"—I specially face 4 4313 31, 97

Wachan was equal to that which decided the fate of Austria at Wagram; the daring intrepidity of the Berezina was again displayed in the forest of Hanan; and if his opponents had been of the same mould on the Elbe that they were at Ulm or Rivoli, the destinies of the world would have been irrevocably decided on the Saxon plains.

Nevertheless, nothing can be more certain than that Napoléon committed the most enormous errors in the course of this camcommuted, paign, and that his conduct on more than one occasion was such, that if it had occurred on the part of any of his lieutenants, he would have made them lose their heads. In fact, when we recollect that, at the resumption of hostilities in the middle of August, he had four hundred thousand combatants and thirteen hundred guns concentrated under his immediate direction on the Elbe, besides three hundred thousand more who maintained the contest in Italy and Spain (1); and that, of this immense force, he led back only eighty thousand men and two hundred guns across the Rhine in the beginning of November, we are at a loss, at first sight, to conceive how it was nossible, that in so short a time so vast a host, hitherto always victorious (save with England) in pitched battles, could have been so entirely discomfited and overthrown. The killed and wounded, and prisoners taken in the different battles, will not explain the difficulty, for they did not amount to a third of the number; and although the unliceded ravages of the biyouac and the hospital always cut off more than the sword of the enemy, yet this source of diminution was common to both armies, and could have made no material difference on the fortunes of either. Napoléon managed matters so, that he rendered the prize of victory enormons beyond all parallel to the conquerors. Thirty thousand prisoners on the spot, and ninety thousand more taken in the fortresses, whom it virtually surrendered to the enemy, constituted the proud trophies of the battle of Leipsie; and marvellons as were the conquests which followed the thunderbolt of Jena, they were as nothing com? pared to those which attended the shock of that mighty field which at one blow prostrated the French empire, and threw back the tricolor flag from the Vistula to the Rhine.

The faults in generalship committed by Napoleon during this campaign. were of such a kind as to be inexplicable on any other footing than that they were the necessary result and natural concomitant of his system of war, when met by a worthy and adequate spirit of resistance on the part of the enemy. We have the authority of Marshal St.-Cyr for the assertion, that the light troops of the Allies, by the manner in which they cut off the foraging parties, and intercepted the communications of the French, did them more injury while on the Elbe, than they sustained in all the pitched battles put together (2); and the chief of Napoleon's engineers, General Rogniat, who mitted frightful ravages on our rear : our depots of cavalry were obliged to fall back towards the Rhine to avoid falling into their power: many horses might have gained the army, if it had been posinight have gauted the army, it it had been pos-sible to allow them to take a few days' repose, nothing could make up for the want of subsistence for the troops and replenishing to the parks. It may safely be affirmed, that these delached corps, as numerous as armies in the time of Turenne, commanded by afficers skilled in that species of war, did more injury to Napotion than the grand allied armies, and were sufficient of themselves to allied armies, and were the lad not instancy lave consummated his rain, if he had not instancy adopted the part of drawing near to the Rhine. The magazines were to thoroughly exhausted, that whom a complete rain good food soldiers, whom a complete rate

⁽¹⁾ The warmest panegyrists of Napoléon admit (1) The warnest panegyrists of Amporent assume this, and even estimate, at a higher amount, the total of the military force then at his disposal, "His military power," says Napier, "was rather broken and divided than lessened; for it is certain that the number of men employed in 1813, was infinitely greater than in 1812. In the latter four hundred thousand men and twelve hundred fieldpieces, were engaged on different points, exclusive of the armies in Spain. Then, on the Vistula, the Oder, and the Elbe, he had powerful fortresses and numerous garrisons, or rather armies, of strength and goodness, to re-establish his ascendancy in Europe."—Napieu's Peninsular War, v. 481.

(2) "The numerous partizans of the enemy committed faithful had access to the whole official documents at headquarters, has stated, that he lost three bundred thousand men by famine in Russia in 1812, and one hundeed thousand by the same cause in Saxons in 1815 (1). It is in this meessant wasting away, the necessary result of earrying on a campaign with such enormous multitudes of men. Nathout any adequate magazines or support of a lasting hand, save what they could extract from the suffering population among whom they were, that the real secret of the destruction of Napoli on's nower is to be found; and the dreadful typhus fever, which in the close of the campaign swent off such unheard-of multitudes in the fortresses on the Fibe, was the natural result of the unexampled privations and misery to which he reduced the gallant conscripts who crowded round his standards. the panegyrists, both on this and the other side of the Channel, who follow the bulleties in ascribing his run entirely to the rigour of the Bussian winter, would do well to explain away the fact proved by the records of the War-office at Paris, that the "morning state" at Wiazma on the 5d Novemher 1812, four days before the frost began, exhibited a total of somewhat above fifty-five thousand combatants and twelve thousand horses; the poor remains of three hundred thousand soldiers and cighty thousand cavalry. whom Napoleon had led in person across the Niemen; that is, he had last above two hundred and forty thousand men under his immediate command, before a flake of snow fell (2). It is neither, therefore, in the rigour of the elereduced from the quiset of the comparing to half estions a d are; this see it supply was latter y aften not formship " - br - t is it tour Vite re. ir, 223 321 (4) * fr to want of the fact ness Napol on sulfer-

(1) Frita wan or man a received few me the three hundred thoused her in Russ s, or I as he ided thoused in sec or Tiest deer old red he i fred thousand in the average of the feet is separate in source of substitution in great parts means reported to the relocate all the books of distillation were related to the important all the source opportunity to distance the intelligent examples that the continuent of the religious assumented by the pilage which went on, ense up and marraged the maganders and in

(2) As the is a point of the very highest imput (2) as he are a point in the every migrest imple sence largelling, as it does a decreive relutation of her assertion so after repeated that if was the cell of Ruse a which destroyed the power of hape lean the following details from the Hamping states in the War off co at large are given sibe sal met see

Harry.

	Infantry	Caretry	H-res
imperial trainly	41 021	6 279	16.37
1st Corps, Davoust,	64 627	3 426	41 117
3d do Neg.	35 715	3 58Y	6 039
thdo Lugene,	42 410	2 3 8	10 037
5 h d > 1 mutowall,	32 159	4 642	9 (3)
8th do tantamme,	15.515	2 010	3 177
1st Corps Cavalry,	,
Japanete	_	120	47 014
2d do Bluebres.	_	10 133	11 175
Fles (muchy.	_	9 878	10 151
454.	_	7 948	$ 764
Inverted Staff Brethier	2.0*5	993	1,115
four a pa and Staff			*****
Be tri			- 1
D com ted Caralry,
	237 e 3	(7 93)
	619 1	,,,

Thought Waster on 4th Rosember three days before the roll townstern of the contratoring water the trains to command of Patriline and been red and from 201,000 to 51 feet, and of lurrer the suggest and sign for worth that to programma and without the contract of 301.5*4

Crand T til of Non and theres, .

439
231
141 321 291
1 500
	23) 18; 226 226

Sterngth on 1th Km (1 days belown 4 pe 4 pe 100) foretry

Cavel y

	1 500
500
$9.700	1.512
4 957
51 117		17.000

progress so deel no al the hurses belong og to the equater to face the cold began on Your ster ? Except of Lazy's Council the Source with Samures, $1 6093 Beens wed at W epok, . -- -At Borol w 41 04 at Borod in At William Including the art bery borner gross and maly, , . . . 12 too) So that above 20,000 horses of the sans ry had ments, nor the accidents of fortune, that we are to seek the real eauses of Napoléon's overthrow: but in the natural eonsequences of his system of conquest; in the oppressive effects of the execrable maxim, that war should maintain war; and in the impatience of taxation and thirst for plunder, in the rapacious military republic of which he formed the head; which, by throwing the armies they had on foot upon external spoliation for their support, at once exposed them, the moment the career of conquest was checked, to unheard-of sufferings, and excited unbounded exasperation among every people over whom their authority prevailed.

After making every allowance, however, for the influence of these causes, which, undoubtedly, were mainly instrumental in producing and accelerating the overthrow of the French revolutionary power: it must be admitted that there are some military errors which he committed in this campaign, which are altogether inexplicable. The destruction of Vandamme's corps, which was the beginning of his long train of disasters, was clearly owing to his imprudence in first ordering him to march on Teplitz, with thirty thousand men, to cut off the retreat of a hundred thousand, and then neglecting to support him, when engaged on his perilous mission, by the Young Guard at Pirna. His plan of commencing offensive operations by three armies at the same time, diverging from a centre at Dresden, was, to say the least of it, imprudent and hazardous; for each army was weakened the further it removed from the central point; and neither, in case of disaster, could afford any rapid or immediate support to the other. On leaving the Saxon capital, he deposited his reserve park of artillery and ammunition in Torgau, separated himself from his only considerable magazine on the Elbe, in Magdeburg, and left thirty-five thousand men, who might have east the balance in his favour in the approaching decisive contest, to stand a siege in Dresden with seven day's provision for the men and three for the horses. At Leipsic, he chose a position to fight, having an impassable morass, traversed only by a single chaussée, in his rear, thereby violating what he himself has told us is the "first requisite for a field of battle, to have no defiles in its rear." When unable to conquer on the first day, he still clung to his ground, though the vast increase of the allied force rendered defeat inevitable: he made no preparation whatever for retreat, and threw no bridges over the Elster, though his engineers could have crected twenty in a single night: and he perilled his crown and his empire in a conflict with greatly superior forces in that dangerous situation, when a hundred and forty thousand of his veteran soldiers were cooped up in the fortresses on the Elbe, the Oder, and the Vistula, to be the trophy of the conqueror in case of defeat.

The general harmonic in the place of the pursued on these occasions had been just as perilous as that which, in 1815, proved his ruin. In the marshes of Arcola in 1796; during the advance to Leoben in 1797; in Moravia, previous to the battle of Austerlitz, in 1805; in Poland, after the defeat of Rapoléon, they are yet, if his waitate. In the marshes of the pursued on these occasions had been just as perilous as that which, in 1815, proved his ruin. In the marshes of Arcola in 1796; during the advance to Leoben in 1797; in Moravia, previous to the battle of Austerlitz, in 1805; in Poland, after the defeat of Eylau, in 1807; on the Danube, after the catastrophic of Aspern, in 4809—he was in equal, if not greater peril, and he extricated himself from the difficulties into which his Improdence had brought him, only by a hanny pudacity, which paralysed or divided his opponents when they had the means of destroying him absolutely within their crash. He never thought of retreat, he never anticipated differt where he was in person with the army—though he provided often carefully for it in the case of his heutenants-but, dashing holdly forward, struck at the centre of the enemy's power, without any thought how, in rise of disaster, he was to maintain his own. This own words, that "If Vexabilet had looked to his retreat at Arbela, or Casar at Pharsalia, they would never have conquered the world," reveal the ruling principle of his wurfare, and explain at once his early triumphs and ultimate disasters. The wide difference between the two in the result of the same and acrous system of warfare, is to he ascribed in a great degree to the superior vigour and upanimity with which he was resisted in the later, to what he had been in the earlier stages of his career. It was the incomparable energy with which the people rose in arms in the latter years of the war, the concord which prevailed among the sovereigns, the perseverance with which they carried through their designs, and the disinterestedness with which they sacrificed all separate interests to the general objects of the albance, which led to its glorious results. Aml. without diminishing the credit due to all in this police career, and admitting that it was on the Russian reserve that the weight of the contest in its last and most serious stages in general fell, justice must yet admit that the chief glory of the deliverance of Germany is to be ascribed to Prussia; and that. but for the meomparable energy with which her meople rose against its oppressors, and which filled the allied ranks with a host of warriors, I evond all

"I shall not," says Gibbon, "be readily accused of funtionin, yet in the form that there are often strong appearances if retribution in human affairs". Hid he lived to the present times, and witnessed the extraordinary confirmation of this truth which the revolutionary contest afforded, his limite cardiont would probably have exterted a still more ungualified tectment.

have extorted a 5th more unqualified resument to Supreme superintendence from the great seeptie of the eighteenth century. On the 16th October 1776, at more o'clock in the morning, Maric-Antonette assembled the fatal scribold, and revolutionary crime revoked its highest point by the murder of a queen and a woman, the noble and unoffunding daughter of the Casars. On that day and that hour twenty year—on the 11th October 1815—the dischere of three punsfrom the allied beadquarters announced the commencement of the battle of Leptle, and the indiction of the greatest punishment on a nation which the lustory of mankind had exhibited. On the 19th of twentoer 18th, revolutionary and ition be led bits greatest external trumph consummated by the surrender of Mack, with threy thousand men, to its victorius leads of the part of the battle of the part of the hadron which of the part of the part of the battle of the part of the part of the battle of the part o

ried of Intent amounts in providing of him in him approximate in 1900 for a relevant shakers and in these and is 1900 for a relevant shakers and in the first him above to a plant in a relevant for a plant in the parameter of a real from the real parameter in a hand of a relevant in the large parameter in a hand of a relevant in the large variety and a hard country here are the amount for variety and and a hard country here are the amount for the relevant for th

⁽i) From a offer in particular lattice for the read of T posteron tasks of 911200 labelling of the 19121 size had $79,000 how to grow, and creating in the fail had posteron of the day of one of an earlier as posterior on the enterty same. On a security as posterior on the enterty same for an earlier as posterior on the enterty same for the ent

October 1815—the final blow was struck for Germany's deliverance by the swords of the fatherland: thirty thousand prisoners lowered their colours to the victors within the walls of Leipsic; and the mighty conqueror, sad and dejected, was leading back his broken and defeated host to the Rhine. On the 20th October 1805, Napoléon, as the brilliant array of Austrian captives defiled before him, said to those around him, "Gentlemen, this is all well; but I must have greater things than these-I want ships, colonies, and commerce." On the very next day after these memorable words were spoken, on the 24st October 1805, the united navies of France and Spain were destroyed by the arm of Nelson; the maritime war was finished by the thunderbolt of Trafalgar; and "ships, colonies, and commerce "had irrevocably passed over to his enemies. Whether these marvellous coincidences were the result of accident; of that accumulation of great events in the years of the Revolution, which rendered almost every day prolific of historic incident: or formed part of the general design of Providence for the more striking manifestation of its judgments upon the world, they are equally worthy of attention. Whatever may be thought of the coincidence of days, it was no accident which directed the march of events; it was no casual combination of chances which led revolutionary ambition to expiate its sins on the Saxon plains; which let fall in due season the sharpened edge of German retribution; and at the darkest period of the contest, sunk the fleets of infidelity in the deep, and righted amidst the waves the destined ark of Christian civilization.

CHAPTER AXXII

TINCO LIMAN AN SPAIN.

ARCHMENT.

on a the West by Dage man of Passage 1 would Dogelet on Passa tagt

Opposition against the Conduct of the Spanish War—Reply on the part of the Government —Means taken for Recruiting the Army—Vast Military Force displayed by Great Britan during this year—Great amount of the Naval Force of this prond—Prodiquous Expenditure of the year—Revenue raised, and Joson contracted, during its continuance—Glorious position which Great Britan occupied at this period—Thomosy Change forteduced at this time in the Financial System of the Empire—Air, Varsitlar's new Plan of Finance, and Artiment in Support of —Air Companies of the Spanish rich Change System—Anawer to the Objection that new Debt was simultaneously contracted during the Vars—Veilington's Liferia to recrease the Army fall he suffer of 1812 —Re is created Generalissimo of the Spanish Armses—Revolt of Eullistrices which leads to his hence decrived of his command—Interaces at Cabit, and Artival of Weilmaton there of Weakness and Disuuton-Operations on the east Coast of the Peninsula-Position and Force of Suchet there-Operations of Sir John Murray-Eaulte of Gastello, and Defeat of the French-Position and Operations of the French Army to the North of the Tagus-

Vittoria—Rapid Progress of the Britsh on the Right—Forcing of the Friend centrecrathen decurse Success on the Left—Test Deleast of the French—Vellengion Blockades Pampeluna and Bristices St.—Schastian—Murray's Operations in the East of Spain—Storges of Taragona, and has Tailure before that place—1 be Arable Scillants of sets in more to Aliceato —Scatchet abandons. Valencia, and retires across the Libro—Vibiliter he is followed by its —Schastian—Desperate Assault and Repulse of the British—Trivial of Soult at 125 journe, and Preparations to recess the Campara—Relative Position and Augusters of the contrading Arable at this Period—Soult's Propieto through the Pyrences—Great success in the Outset —The British latt and price Battle in front of Pampelion—trivial of Wellington, and first Battle of Surveya—Second Battle there, and Defeat of the French—Ther Delastices Re-

-Views of Wellington for the Campaign at this Period-Passage of the Bilassos, and Invasion of Frace-Obstitute Conflict at the Great Rhune-Position ind Views of South this Period-Suchet refuses to co-operate with him-Blockade and Fall of Pampelunacause them to be sent back into Spain—Passage of the Nive and Battles in front of Bayonne—Combat of the 10th—Desperate Battle on the 11th, under Hill—Combat of the 12th, and Final Defeat of the French—Position of the two Armies at this Period—Reflections on this Campaign—Extraordinary Rapidity with which the French Power in the Peninsula was overthrown.

Tur. strength of France, put forth with extraordinary and Singular progress in unheard-of vigour at the commencement of the Revolution, subsequently exhibited the languor incident to a weak and oppressive during the Revolution, democratic government; was again drawn ont with unexampled ability by the powerful arm of Napoléon; and finally sunk under the total exhaustion of its moral energies and physical resources, from long continued warfare. In the year 4795, twelve hundred thousand hurning democrats ran to arms, impelled alike by political passion, external ambition, and internal starvation; and, on the principle of making war maintain war, proceeded to regenerate by revolutionizing and plundering all mankind. In the year 1799, the vehemence of this hurst had exhausted itself; the armies of the Republic. sunk down to less than two hundred thousand men, were no longer able to make head against their enemies; Italy, Germany, Switzerland, were lost; and on the Var, the Rhine, and the Limmat, its generals maintained a nainful an almost honcless defensive against superior forces. The extraordinary genius of Napoleon, by skilfully directing the whole talent and energy of France into the military profession, again brought back victory to the army of the Revolution, and carried the imperial standards in triumph to Cadiz, Vienna, and the Kremlin. But there is a limit in human affairs to the strength of passion, however profoundly aroused, or the energy of wickedness, however skilfully directed. The period had now arrived when all the material resources of the Revolution were at once to fail, all its energies to he suddenly exhansted: when its external finances, deprived of the aid of foreign plunder, were to be involved in inextricable embarrassment; and its domestic resources, destitute of credit, and having exhausted every method of internal spoliation, were to become totally improductive: when the confiscation of the property of the communities and the hospitals of the poor was to be unable to afford any relief to a yawning exchequer; and repeated levies, of three hundred thousand conscripts each, were to fail in making any sensible addition to the strength of its armies: when even the dreaded prospect of foreign subjugation was to be unable to excite any general spirit of resistance in the country; and the mighty conqueror instead of sweeping over Europe at the head of five hundred thousand men, was to be reduced to a painful defensive with fifty thousand on the plains of Champagne.

Contrast which the progress of the first of England affords during the same period, exhibit a remarkable and memorable contrast to this downward progress. In the first insame period, gularly diminutive, and so obviously disproportioned to the contest in which she had engaged, as to excite at this time unbounded feelings of surprise. The revenue raised for 1795, the first year of the war, including the loan, was under twenty-five millions; the land forces only reached forty-six thousand men in Europe, and ten thousand in India; the sea, eighty-five ships of the line in commission (1). Such was the impatience of taxation in a popular, and ignorance of war in an insular and commercial community;

⁽¹⁾ M'Culloch's Stat. of Great Britain, ii. 438. James' Nav. Ilist. i. A. Tables, i. 1.

and with these diminutive forces, alded by a disjointed and realous alliance. its rulers seriously expected to arrest the forrent of revolutionary ambition. supported by twelve hundred thousand men in arms. It is not surprising that disaster, long continued and general, attended such an attenut. But as the contest rolled on. England warmed in the fight repeated naval triumphs roused the latent spirit of glory in her people, necessity made them submit without a murmur to increased expenditure, and magnanimous constancy. amidst continued continental reverses, still, with mournful resolution, prolonged the contest. At length the Spanish war gave her a fitting field for inilitary exertion, and Wellington taught her rulers the principles of war, her people the path to victory But even then, when her land and sea forces were every year progressively augmented, until they had reached a height nunaralleled, when taken together, in any former age or country, when her fleets had obtained the undisputed dominion of the waves, and her land forces carried her standards in tummph to every quarter of the globe, the magnitude of her resources, the justice of her rule, the industry of her people, enabled her to carry on the new gigantic contest without any recourse to revolutionary spoliation, or any infringement either on the credit of the state or the provision for its destitute inhabitants. Instead of declining as the contest advanced, her resources were found to multiply in almost a miraculous manner twenty years of warfare seemed only to have added to tho facility with which she horrowed boundless sums, and the regularity with which she raised an unheard-of revenue, while thy tended to augment the fidelity with which she had performed her engagements to the public creditors, and the sacred regard which she paid to the sinking fund, the sheetanchor of future generations, and the poor's rate, the refuge of the present And it will not be considered by subsequent times the least mary clious circumstance in that age of wonders, that in the year 1815, in the twentieth year of the war, the British empire raised, by direct taxation, no less than twenty-by indirect, forty-eight millions sterling, that she borrowed thirtynine millions for the current service of the year, at a rate of less than five and a half per cent, and expended a hundred and seven milions on the pubhe service, that she had eight hundred thousand men in arms in Europe, and two hundred thousand in Asia, all raised entirely by voluntary enhalment, and two hundred and forty slaps of the line in her service, that she carried on war successfully in every quarter of the globe, and sent Wellington into France at the head of a hundred thousand combatants, while her subsidies to foreign powers exceeded the immense sum of eleven millions sterling (t), and that, during all this gigantic expenditure, she preserved inviolate a Sinking Fund of above inteen millions sterling, and assessed herself annually to the amount of more than six millions sterling for the support of the noor

Surprizing as the contrast between the opposite progress of France to the contrast between the opposite progress of France to the contrast and Lugland, in finances, expenditure, and national resources, and Lugland, in finances, expenditure, and nemorable as is the proof it alfords of the difference between the ultimate resources of a resolutionary, and a free but stable community, it becomes still more remarkable, when the difference in the material resources with which they everally commenced the contest, is taken into consideration. I rance, at the commencement of the Revolution, had a population of somewhal less than twenty-eight millions, a revenue of twenty-one millions sterling, and a debt of two hundred and forty millions; and Great Britain, including Ireland, had not a population at the same period of more than fifteen millions, her total revenue was under seventeen millions, and her debt was no less than two hundred and thirty-three millions. While, therefore, the national burdens of the two countries were about the same, the physical and pecuniary resources of France were greater, the former by nearly a hundred; the latter by about thirty per cent than those of the British empire. And although, without doubt, England possessed vast resources from her immense commerce and her great colonial possessions; yet in these respects, too, France was far from being deficient. Her navy at that period numbered eighty-two ships of the line, a force greater than that which now bears the royal flag of England, and which had in the American war combated on equal terms with the British fleet; her mercantile vessels were very considerable, those engaged in the West India trade alone being above sixteen hundred, and employing twenty-seven thousand sailors; while her magnificent colony of St.-Domingo alone raised a greater quantity of colonial produce than the whole British West India islands, and took off manufactures to the extent of ten millions sterling yearly from the parent state (1).

"When a native of Louisiana," says Montesquieu, "wishes to Causes of obtain the fruit of a tree, he lays the axe to its root—Behold the emblem of despotism." It is in this striking remark that the explanation is to be found of the extraordinary difference between the progress in the national resources, during the contest, in two states which began with advantages preponderating in favour of the one which was ultimately exhausted in the strife. Democratic despotism, the most severe and wasting of all the scourges which the justice or mercy of Heaven lets loose upon guilty man, had laid the axe to the root of French internal prosperity, and forced her people, by absolute necessity, into the career of foreign conquest, even before the war commenced with the British empire. Spoliation had extinguished capital; the assignats had annihilated credit, confiscation ruined landed property, general distress destroyed industrial wealth. Judging from past experience, the British government not unnaturally imagined, that a nation in such a state of general insolvency would have been unable to maintain the contest for any considerable time; and this, doubtless, would have been the case, if it had depended on its own resources alone for the means of carrying it on. But they did not anticipate, what experience so soon and fearfully demonstrated, the energy and almost demoniac strength which a nation, possessing a numerous and warlike population, can in such desperate circumstances acquire, by throwing itself in desolating hordes upon the resources of its enemics, after its own have been destroyed. It was this withering grasp which the French Revolution laid first upon the whole property of its own people, and then upon that of its opponents, which constituted, from first to last, the real secret of its success; and the energy which it so long developed was no other than the passions of sin, turned into this new and alluring channel. But despotic spoliation, whether at home or abroad, is still laying the axe to the root of the tree which bears the fruits of industry; and no different result can be expected, in the long run, from the

⁽¹⁾ Ante, v. 4.
It produced no less than L.18,400,000 worth of sugar and other produce, including the Spanish portion: the whole British islands at this time do not preduce so much.—In 1832, prior to the late disastrous changes in these islands, the value of their annual produce was about L.22,000,000; now it is reduced to less than L.17,000,000.—Ante, v. 4; and Porter's Parl. Tables, ir

one than the other. The exhaustion of the French empire, in 1814, when it had drained away the resources and exasperated the hearts of all Europe, was as complete as that of the Republic of France had been in 1705, when it had effected the destruction of property of every description within its own bounds. Whereas in England, where property during the whole strife was religiously respected, and the hand of the spoiler was withheld alike from the mite of the widow and the palace of the peer, the resources provided for the strife, though infinitely less considerable in the outset, were far more durable in the end; and, instead of declining and withering up as the contest rolled on, daily became greater and greater with the growth of the protected industry of her people, until they acquired a decisive preponderance over the gains of violence, and arrayed Europe in dense and burning battalions, to assert the trumph of the rule of sustice over that of innounts.

General manifests of the Moscow campaign, the animating prospect which the resurrection of Germany afforded, the glorious to the prospect which the campaign of Salamanea had achieved, totally exercised with the distance of opinion and voice of faction in Great campaign of the distance of the distance object which they had uniformly desired—the general pacification of the world, while the Tories supported it from a conviction that one vigorous effort would now put a period to the sacrifices of the nation, and give a durabla ascendency to the conservative principles for which they had so long and strenuously contended. Thus both parties, though with different objects, now combined in recommending the utnost vigour in the prosecution of hostinities, and what is very remarkable, and perhaps unprecedented in British history, the chief complaint made against Government by the leaders of the popular party was, that they had yielded too much to the advice which they themselves had so long and cloquently tendered, and had not prosecuted the war with the vigour which the favourable circumstances which had occurred so imperatively required (1).

Argument O 12 required (1)

of the Op position

a, a not the conduct of the Span sh

the space a armost the rejoicings and acclamations of triumph, has counteracted the brilliant successes of our arms, and has converted the glad feelings of a just exufiation into the bitterness of regret and disappointment? With an army in discipling and spirit superior to any that had ever before been assembled, untiling in itself qualities so various as to have never entered into the assembled of any other species of force; with a general pronounced by the whole world to be unsurpassed in ancient or modern times—the pride of ments:—how is it that they have terminated only in disappointment, that a system of advance has suddenly and inevitably been converted into a system of retreat; and that the great conqueror who chased the French armies from the plains of Salaminea has been pursued in his turn over those very plains, the scene of his trumph and his glory, to take refuge in the very positions which he held before the earnpaine commenced?

"The advantages of our situation in the Peuinsula, during the last campaign, were very great, and totally different from what they had been at any previous period. The reduction of Cindad Rodrigo and Badajoz, weakened in a great degree the enemy's frontier lines; and this advantage was accompanied by a most extraordinary and unlooked-for failure in the means, and relaxation of the exertions, of the French in the Peninsula. The efforts of the French army were deprived of the unity of counsel, of design, and of action; distraction reigned among the generals; the exertions of their armies were wholly different from those which we have witnessed when the soul which inspired them was present, infusing its own vigour into every operation. The central government in Madrid was miserable beyond description; without power to enforce obedience, without talents to create respect, or authority to secure compliance, it was at the mercy of rival and independent generals; each solicitons only for his own fame or aggrandizement, and little disposed to second each other in any operations for the public good. Here, then, was a most astonishing combination of favourable circumstances; and yet we have derived no greater benefit from them than we did from previous campaigns, when every thing was of the most adverse character.

"To take advantage of these favourable contingencies, we should clearly have augmented our force in Spain to such an amount as would have enabled its general at once to have in the field a force adequate to cheek the main hody of the French army, and another to carry on active operations. Unless you did so, you necessarily exposed your cause to disaster; because the enemy, by relinquishing minor objects, and concentrating his forces against your one considerable army, could easily, being superior on the whole, be enabled in the end to overwhelm and crush it. Hill never had a force of more than five thousand British, and twelve thousand Portuguese and Spaniards; yet, with this handful of men, he kept in check all the disposable forces of Soult in Estremadura—a clear proof of the vast benefit which would have arisen to the allied cause if an adequate force of perhaps double or triple the amount had been similarly employed. Now, what period could have been desired so suitable for making such an effort, as that when the central government at Madrid was imbecile and nugatory, the French armies separated and disunited, Napolcon thoroughly engrossed with his all-absorbing expedition to Russia, and the British army in possession of a central position on the flank of the theatre of war, which at once menaced hostility and defied attack?

"The successes which have been gained throughout the whole campaign -and they have been not only brilliant, but in some degree lasting-were entirely owing to the skill of the general and the valour of his troops, and in no degree to the arrangement or combination at home on the part of those who had the direction of military affairs. Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajoz were both carried with means scandalously inadequate, by intrepid daring on the part of the general, and the shedding of torrents of English blood. After the reduction of the last of these fortresses, what was the policy which obviously was suggested to the British general? Evidently to have pursued his advantages in the south, attacked Soult in Andalusia, destroyed his great military establishments in that province, and again brought Spain into active hostility, by rescuing from the grasp of the enemy its richest and most important provinces. He was prevented from doing this, to which interest and inclination equally pointed, by the necessity of returning to the north to check the incursion of Marmont into Beira, and by the notoriously unprovided state of Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajoz to withstand a siege. With whom did the blame of not providing r of vice adequate means for the protection of the north, when to was pursued in the south, rest? Evidently with the Government at home, which both neglected to send out the requisite supplies, and never minitained the British force in the field at more than half the amount which their ample resources, both unitary and negment, would have afforded.

"When the invasion of Leon was commenced in July, and the whole disnosable British force was periled on a single throw, the defects in the combinations, and languor in the support of Government, were still more consucuous That irruption, attempted by forty-five thousand men inlo a country occurred by two hundred and fifty thousand, could be based only on the prospect of powerful co-operation in other quarters. Was any such afforded? Murray's descent on the eastern coast, with the Anglo Sighan expedition. was mainly relied on . but did it arrive in time to take any part of the pressure off Wellington? So far from it, though the whole arrangements for the sailing of the expedition were concluded as early as March, set on the 15th July he had heard nothing of its movements, and he was compelled to begin a systematic retreat-in the course of which he gained, indeed, by his own skill, a most splendid victory. -- but which, leading, as it did, to a concentration of the enemy's troops from all parts of the Peninsula, involved him in fresh difficulties, where the meanacity of Ministers was if possible still more conspicuous. No sufficient efforts were made to provide the general with specie, and all his operations were cramped by the want of that necessary sinew of war. No adequate train of artiflery was provided for the siege of Burgos, no means of resisting the concentration of troops from all parts of tho Peninsula were afforded to lum, and he was ultimately compelled, after the most glorious efforts, to relinquish all his conquests, except the two fortresses first gained, and again to take refuge within the Portugueso frontier

"So nicely balaoced were the forces of the contending parties during this memorable campaign, that there is no stage of it to which twelve thousand additional infantry and three thousand cavalry would not have ensured decisive success Now, was such a force at the disposal of Covernment, in addition to those which were actually on service in the Peninsula? The details of the war-office leave no room for doubt on this head. During the whole of last year there were, exclusive of veteran and garrison corps, forty-five battalions of regular infantry, and sixteen regiments of cavalry, presenting a total of fifty-three thousand men . besides seventy-seven thousand regular militia, two hundred thousand local militia, and sixty-eight thousand yeomanry cavalry Can any one doubt that, out of this immense force, lying dormant as it were within the British islands, at least twenty five thousand might have been forwarded to the Peninsula? And yet the whole number sent was only 'twenty one thousand, of whom more than one half were drafts and recruits, leaving only ten thousand five hundred and forty-five actually sent out of fresh regiments Why was not this number doubled-why was it not trobled? Were we looking for a more favourable opportunity than when Napoléon was absent with half his military force in Russia? Did we wait for more glorious co-operations than was afforded us during the Moscow campaign? And what would have been the effect in France if, when the shattered remains of the grand army were arriving on the Elbe, Wellington, with one hundred thousand men, flushed with victory, had been thundering across the Pyrenecs (1)?

To these able arguments at was replied by Lord Bathurst, Lord the period and Lord Hverpool — The confident tone assumed by the noble Marquis night induce the stylicion that his brother, the illustrious Wellington, shares his opinions, and is dissatisfied with the support which he received from Government during the campaign. But the fact is otherwise, and he has voluntarily written to them expressing his entire satisfaction with their conduct in this particular. The objections made are mainly founded upon this: that we have not in the Peninsular contest employed our whole disposable force; that it might have been materially augmented without detriment to the home service; but it was not the policy of this country, it was not in itself expedient, to employ its whole force upon any one foreign service, how important soever; but rather to retain a considerable reserve at all times ready in the citadel of our strength, to send to any quarter where it may appear capable of being directed to the greatest advantage. No one will dispute the importance of the Peninsular contest; but can it be seriously maintained that it is in that quarter alone that the dawning of European freedom is to be looked for? Is Russia nothing? Is Prussia nothing? And, with the profound hatred which French domination has excited in the north of Germany, is it expedient to put ourselves in a situation to be unable to render any assistance to insurrectionary movements in IIanover, Holland, or the north of Germany; countries still nearer the heart of the enemy's power, and abounding with a more efficient warlike population than either Spain or Portugal?

"When it is stated, too, that the campaign terminated with the British armies in the same quarters which they held at its commencement; this, though geographically true, is in a military and political point utterly erroneous. Was the reduction of Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajoz, the capture of the whole heavy artillery of the armies of Portugal and of the centre, at the former of these fortresses and the Retiro, nothing? Is it no small matter to have shaken loose the spoiler's grasp over the whole of Spain? to have compelled the evacuation of Andalusia and Granada, taken twenty thousand prisoners, and destroyed the great warlike establishments at Seville and before Cadiz, stored, as they were, with above a thousand pieces of cannon? If the expedition of Soult to the south of the Sierra Morena, contrary as it was to all military principle, while the English power in Portugal remained unsubdued, was suggested entirely by the desire to open up new and hitherto untouched fields of plunder; the loss of these provinces, the throwing back the enemy for his whole support on the central provinces of Spain, the wasted scene of his former devastation, was a proportional disadvantage to his cause, a proportional benefit to the allied operations. How many campaigns in English history will bear a comparison, not merely in brilliant actions, but in solid and durable results, with that of Salamanca? And it is, perhaps, not the least proof of its vast moral influence, that it has wrought an entire change in the views of the gentlemen opposite; and, for the first time in the history of the war, made the burden of their complaint, not, as heretofore, that too much, but that too little has been done by British co-operation for the deliverance of Europe.

"The expected co-operation of Lord William Bentinck from Sicily, certainly, did not arrive at the time that was calculated upon; but the fault there lay not with Government, but in circumstances which prevented that officer from exercising in due time the discretion with which he was timeously invested, as to appearing with a powerful British force on the east of Spain in the beginning of July. The failure of the attack on Burgos, however much to be regretted, was neither to be ascribed to negligence on the part of Government in forwarding the necessary stores, nor to want of foresight on the part of Lord Wellington in the preparations for its a battering train, because he never thought it would be regulred; if he had done so, he could at once have got any amount of heavy guns he required from the ships of war at Santander. Even as it was the fort would have been taken but for the accidental death of the officer who headed the assault on the 22d September, and the still more unfortunate circumstance of his having had upon his person a plan of the siege, so that the whole designs of the British engineers became known to the enemy. The complaints made of the want of specie at Lord Wellington's headquarters are sufficiently answered by the fact, that such was the state of the exchanges from the extraordinary demand for specie on the Continent, that we lost twenty-four ner cent upon all remittances to the Peninsula, which, upon the L.45,000,000 which the campaign actually cost, occasioned a further loss of L.5.000,000. But the effect of the last campaign is yet to be judged of; it is not in a single season that the French power in the Peninsula, the growth of five years' conquest, is to be uprooted. The blow delivered at Salamanea loosened their power over the whole realm : one is, perhaps, not far distant which may totally everthrow it (1)."

Upon a division, Marquis Wellesley's motion for a committee of inquiry into the conduct of the war, was negatived by a majority of 70—the numbers, including:

Neans lakes for secretary

the army to result from the conducting of the war in Spain on a more extended seale, and in a manner worthy of the great nation which was engaged in the strife; viz. that Government were induced to make the utmost efforts, both to augment the numbers and efficiency of the regular army at home, and to increase the reinforcements that were forwarded to Wellington in the Peninsula. For several years past, the system had been adopted of providing for the increase of the regular army, by permitting the privates of the militia to volunteer into the line, and offering them large bounties, amounting sometimes to twelve and fourteen guineas, to do so. By this means, the objectionable measure of a direct conscription was avoided, and recruits were obtained for the army of a better description than could otherwise be obtained by voluntary enlistment, and possessing the great advantage of being already thoroughly drilled and exercised. So efficacious was this system, that joined to the warlike enthusiasm produced by the victories in the Peninsula, it produced during this year twenty-five thousand men for the army; a force which more than compensated the waste of the Spanish war, great as it was, and which was nearly double of the amount obtained by prviate enlistment, which had never reached fourteen thousand (5).

The mittary force maintained during this year by Great Britain, independent of the force in India, was immense; and, coupled with the vast navy which it was necessary to keep for the maritime war, in which America had now appeared as a principal enemy, presented perhaps the greatest aggregate of warlite strongli ever put forth by any single nation since the beginning of the world. The land forces presented a total of two lundred and twenty-eight thousand regular troops, having increased twelve thousand even after all the loses of the year 1813, besides twenty-eight thousand British soldiers in India, and ninety-three thousand militia in the British islands, in no respect inferior to the army of the line, and thirty-two thousand foreign corps in the British service. The sepoy force in India numbered no less than two hundred thousand men, presenting a total of five hundred and eighty-two thousand soldiers in arms, all raised by voluntary enlistment, and exclusively devoted to that as a profession. In addition to this, the local-militia, similar to the Prussian landwehr, in the British islands, amounted to no less than three hundred thousand; and the yeomanry cavalry, or landwehr horse, were sixty-eight thousand! exhibiting a total of nine hundred and forty-nine thousand men in arms, of which seven hundred and forty-nine thousand were drawn from the population of the British islands (1).

⁽¹⁾ Parl. Deb. xxv 66, 71, 87 (2) Farl Deb 85

Immense as these forces are, the marvel that they should have reached such an amount is much increased, when the magnitude force at that period. of the naval establishment kept up in the same year is considered, and the limited physical resources of the country which, at the close of a twenty years' war, made such prodigious efforts. The British navy, at the commencement of 1815—and it was kept up at the same level during the whole year—amounted to two hundred and forty-four ships of the line, of which one hundred and two were in commission, and two hundred and nine-teen frigates, besides smaller vessels: making in all, one thousand and nine ships in the service of England, of which six hundred and thirteen were in commission, and bore the royal flag! This immense force was manned by one hundred and forty thousand seamen, and eighteen thousand marines: making a total, with the land forces, of eleven hundred and seven thousand marines at the seven thousand marines are thousand marines.

(1) Martin's Colonial Hist. i. 319. Army Estimates for 1813. Parl. Deb. xxiv. 346, 867.

Military Force of Great Britain, and its Cost, in the year 1813.

		-
	Men.	Great Britain.	Ireland.
		Charge.	Charge.
Land forces (including various contingencies),	227,442	L. 3,196,188	L. 331,012
British Regiments in the East Indies,	28,809	836,649
Tronps and enmpanies for recruiting do.,	533	30,236	_
Embodied militia,	93,210	1,983,961	1,098,529
Staft and garrisons,	-	513,792	109,226
Full pry to supernumerary officers,		32,088	940
Public departments,		308,201	11,960
Half-pay,		206,250	25,443
Half-pay. In-pensioners of Chelsea and Kilmainham hospitals.		39,281	18,332
Ont-Pensioners of ditto,		432,695	91,239
Widows' pensions,		50.011	8,103
Volunteer corps, cavalry,	68,000	209,237	266,123
Local militia,	304,000 .	636,623
l'oreign corps,	32,163	1,174,019	31,623
Royal Military Chilege,		38,993	-
Knyal Military Asylum		23,096	-
Allowance to retired chaplains.		19,394	1,923
Medicines and hospital expenses,		105,000	22,081
Compassionate list,		. 30,055
Barrack department (Ireland),		- ,	460,583
Commissariat department (heland),		~ "	295,605
Superannu ited allinumiees,			4,334
Total military force,	753.357	1 1 1 7	1
Deduct Local M. and Volunt,			Luca
bradet Local M. and volunt,	372,000	·
Total regulars and militia,	381.357	13 921,494	3,213,063 '
Deducts regts, in East Indies,		836,619
bettuets regis, in Lase Indies, 5 1.	20,009	830,010
Remain to be provided for, 1813,	353,348	13,044,811	3,213,063
Regulars and militia, evelusive of the native troops in the East Indies, who were,	201,000

⁻Parliamentary Debates, vol. viv. p. 316.

thousand were drawn from the papulation of the British islands! When it is recollected that this immense farce was raised in an empire in Europe not at that period numbering above eighteen millions of souls over its bulod extent (1)—that is, considerably under half the population of the French empire, which had a population of forty-twa millions to work upon for its army of nine hundred thousand men, and hardly any naval force affoat to support, it must be admitted, that bistory has not preserved so memorable an instance of natrotic exertion (2)

Professional But these efforts drew after them a proportional expenditure, and of the green never at any former period had the annual charges of government in the British empire been so considerable The army alone, cost L 19,000,000, its extraordinaries L 9,000,000 more the nny 1 20,000,000, the ordanace L 5,000,000, and so layish had the expenditure become, under the excitement and necessities of the war, that the unpravided expenditure of the year preceding, amounted to no less than L 4,602,000. But these charges, great and unprecedented as they were, constituted but a part of the expenses of the constituted but a part of the expenses of the great and unprecedented as they were, constituted but a part of the expenses of the great and unprecedented as they were constituted but a part of the expenses of the great and unprecedented as they were, constituted but a part of the expenses of the great and unprecedented as they were, constituted but a part of the expenses of the great and unprecedented as they were the great and unprecedented as they we ts which stemmed the

besides warlike stores sent to Germany, to the amount of two millions more. The war on the Continent, during this year, cost in all, in subsidies or fittenishings to foreign powers, ten millions four lundred thousand pounds, af which Germany alone received above six millions, and yet so little was Great Britain exhausted by these immense exertions, that she was able at the same time to advance a loan of two millians sterling to the East India Gompany. The total expenditure of the year, including Ireland, and reckning the current vote of credit, reached the amazing and unprecedented amount of our handless of the Crist Lindia Gompany.

(1) Population of Great Br ta n i 1811 12 552 641 (2) James a Naval II st. vi 516 Table 1 500 600 500 600 500 600 Fe H Deb xar 12° 116 50ppl cafor 1915 lb d

-Pal Ded av 236 Con us Paners

f post or and proffers

Public lines no of Great Be to a for the year ($15 and) much January 1814

I was a success of ottach to a most at a Jean 1010 on	6 4 4
l Pe n anent Re en e
Cn. oms	1 8 086 313
Fte se	18 5 5 833
Stamps	5 5,2 400
Land and Assessed Taxes	7 803 459
1 ort-off ce	1 613 138
Persons is in the pound,	20 423
Salare Gla tlejound	12 151
Hackney-con tes	22 245
Hawkers and pedlars,	18 201
Total perms ent a l'annual dut es		L 41 671 997
Small Dranches of the Hered tary Per	cane
Al east on fine		8 392
Post f ses		2 h23

Catry over

83 °03

Revenue raised and loans contracted during the currency of a single year, espetiated during the year. cially as the manufacturing industry of the country had for above

	Brought over, .	L.	41.780,009 - Extraordinary Resources and IVar Taxes.
1	Customs,		3,235,358 6,113,853
J	Properly-lax,		14,588,286 1,593
j	Arrears of income duty,	,	238.666
1	Monies paid on account of the interest of loans raised for the service of Ir On account of the Dalance due by Ireland on joint expenditure of the I	eland, Inited	3,198,956
. (Kingdom,	• •	3,956,286 54,200
(On account of the commissioners for issuing commercial exchaquer bills.		490,591
(On account of the interest of a loan, etc., granted to the Prince-Regent of Por	tugal,	53,130 107,355
ì	Surplus fees of regulated public offices,	rest,	56,501
(Other monies paid to the public,		65,660
]	Total, independent of loans, . Loans paid into the Exchequer, including L.600,000 for the service of Ir		73,940,537 35,050,534
	Count Total		00 004 071
-A1	mual Register for 1814, p. 367.	1	08,991,071
	Public Expenditure of Great Britain for the year 1813, ending 5th	January 181	4.
1. Fo	or interest on the Public Debt of Great Britain unre- deemed, including annuities for Lives and terms of	-	,
11 1	years,		L. 39,815,846 2,081,529
111.		1,028,000	2,001,020
1V.	Other charges on the Consolidated Fund, viz,	60 000	•
	Mint,	69,992 13,333
	Allowance to Royal Family,	332,412
	Bounties,	67,955 79,956
31 (Civil Government of Scotland,		1,591,618
vi.	Other payments in anticipation of the Exchequer Receipt, Bounties for Fisheries, Manufactures, Corn, etc.	000 744	133,176
	Pensions on the Hereditary Revenue,	228,341 2,770 134,614	365,725
1/11	N ver	11 279 517	-
V 11	Navy,	6,568,320
	The Transport Service, L.3,565,790 Miscellaneous Service,	•
		4,055,790	21,996,623
VIII	l. Ordinance,	18,500,790	3,404,527
11.	Extraordinary Services and Subsidies,	22,262,951
	Deduct the Remittances and Advances to other Coun-	40,763,741
	tries,	11,294,416
	Loans, etc., to other Countries, viz -		29,469,325
Α.	Ireland,	4,700,416
	Sicily,	-, -,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,,	•
	Portugal,
	Sweden, 1,563,804
	Russia,
•	Austria,		•
	Hanover, North of Europe,
	Emperor of Moroceo,	11,335,412
			16,035,828
	Total expenditure,		L.111,761,051

two years been most seriously obstructed, and most grievous distress induced in many districts by the cessation of all mercantile connexion with America ra tha demands muon the excheaner, that after the sum non twen mater ... which appeared adequate to the whole probable necessities of the state in March a further and very considerable addition to the national debt had become necessary in November. The Joan at first contracted in March was L 21.000,000, but even this ample supply proved insufficient, and parlia ment was assembled early in November to make a further addition to the means to be placed at the disposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer An additional loan of twenty-two millions was voted in that month. of which one half was devoted to the current expenses of the year, and one half to fund an equal amount of exchequer bills, which had now become so considerable as to occasion a very serious pressure on the money market To meet the interest and contribution to the sinking fund for these great loans, additional taxes, chiefly on tobacco, malt, and spirits, to the amount of I 610,000 in Ireland, and spirits and sugar, and lesser articles in Great Britain, to the amount of L 800,000, were imposed, but they were far from meeting the total interest on the sums and floating debt contracted. borrowed during the year Net so little were even these immense loans from affecting the public credit, or exhausting the necessary resources of Creat Britain, that they seemed to have a directly contrary effect, the resources of the empire roso up with the more buoyancy the greater the load was which was imposed upon them. Decisive proof of this occurred in this year, for while the loan contracted in spring was concluded at the rate of L 5 10 6 per cent, that in November was obtained on the more favourable terms of L 5 0 2 per cent, and such was the competition of capitalists to obtain shares and a half per cent(t)

The law is the convergence of the highest point in the military and na
The law is the course of the actions without having ever, in the course of this actuous contest, compromised her principles, or yielded to the circumstance of the public debt, or infringed either upon the security of property or the provision for the poor, she had attained her long in the lorn at this reduced rate, that not only were many disappointed who had come to bid, but the premium on it in the market next day rose three

Brought over L-114 761 05¢ X1 11 s elianeous Services -At Home 3 507 931 Abroad 497 890 4 005 821 118 766 875 Bedacts as wi ch all hough a laded said specou t form no part of the expend use of Great Br a s vz Loan for Irel nd 4 300 416 In crest at I per cent and management on Portuguese Los Pr ue pal lot rest etc. of Connerce at Excheq er B H 57 170 4.525 g Fund on losa to the East I d'a Company 111 021 4 503 202 111 263 573 -danual Reg ter for 1814 p 374

⁽¹⁾ Mr Vansattart e speech June 11 I and Nov 15th 4813 1acl D h xxv 578 ato and xxvi 107 110

sought-for object, and not only provided for her own security by her valour. but delivered Enrope by her example. In the eloquent words of Mr. Canning, who, though in opposition to Government since his rupture with Lord Castlereagh in 1809, still remained true to his principles, "What we have accomplished is, establishing the foundations upon which the temple of peace may be crected, and imagination may now picture the completion of that structure, which, with hopes less sanguine, and hearts less high, it would have been folly to have attempted to raise. We may now confidently hope to arrive at the termination of labour and the commencement of repose. It is impossible to look back to those periods when the enemy vannted, and we perhaps feared, that we should have been compelled to sue for peace, without returning thanks, amidst all our challitions of joy, to that Providence which gave us conrage and heart still to bear up against accumulating calamity. Peace is safe now, because it is not dictated; peace is safe now, for it is the fruit of exertion, the child of victory; peace is safe now, because it will not be purchased at the expense of the interest and the honour of the empire: it is not the ransom to buy off danger, but the lovely fruit of the mighty means we have employed to drive danger from our shores (4)."

"Nulla magna civitas," says Hannibal, "din quiescere potest; change inticoluced at si foris hostem non habet, domi invenit; nt prævalida corpora ab this period externis causis tuta videntur, sed suis ipsa viribus onerantur. Taninto the Linnace tum nimirum ex publicis malis sentimus, quantum ad privatas System of res attenit; nec in eis quidquam acrius quam necuniæ dannum stimulat (2)." Never was the truth of these memorable words more clearly demonstrated than in the financial history of Great Britain, as it preceded and as it followed this momentous year. During the whole anxieties, perils, and hurdens of the contest, the government of England, directed by noble hearts, upheld by heroic arms, had adhered with unshaken constancy to the system for the redemption of the public debt : not one shilling had been diverted from this sacred purpose during the darkest, the most distressed, or the most hopeless period of the contest; and the result had been, that the Sinking Fund—the sheet-anchor of the nation's credit—now exceeded tifteen millions sterling, having increased to that immense amount, from one million in 1786, when it was first placed on an efficient footing by Mr. Pitt (5). Now, however, when the nation was about to reap the fruits of its heroic constancy; when the clouds which had so long obscured its course were dispersing, and the glorious dawn of peace and security was beginning to shine on the earth, the resolution of its rulers failed: the provident system of former days was abandoned; duty was sacrificed to supposed expediency; the fatal precedent was introduced, of abandoning the protection of the future for the relief of the present: and that vacillation appeared in our financial councils, which made it painfully evident, that, with the dangers of the war, its heroic spirit was about to depart.

Mr. Vansit-This great and momentous change in our financial policy, the plan of effects of which have heen felt with such severity in later times, was thus introduced by Mr. Vansittart, on a day which deserves to in support he noted as among the most disastrons which England ever knew-March 5, 1845.—" Towards the close of last session, in the discussions which took place on our financial situation, a general conviction seemed to prevail, that some measure of unusual severity had become necessary to take off the load which depressed public credit. Six months, however, have elapsed since that period—six months, the most momentous ever known in the history of Europe. The face of the world has been changed, and from the conflict between insatiable, unprincipled, remorseless ambition on the one side, and lardy, stubborn, though untulored patriotism on the other, have resulted consequences the most important, ond hopes the most satisfactory to the cause of humanity. That necessity no longer exists, and in consequence, the time appears to have now arrived, when, without impairing our public credit—without postponing the period when the entire liquidation of our public debt may will confidence be anticipated—the nation may safely obtain some relief from the unaralleled exertions which thus made.

"It is by an alteration on the Sinking Fund, as it has been established by act of Parliament in 1802, that this relief, which has now become necessary. is to be obtained. The great danger of the Sinking Fund, which has now become an engine of such vast power and efficacy in the state, is, that it will soon come to reduce the debt too rapidly. If the contraction of loans ceases, it will soon come to pay off twenty, thirty, nay, forty millions annually, and the reduction of these immense sums will not, as heretofore, he concealed or neutralized by the simultaneous contraction of debt to an equal or greater amount, but it will appear at once by the diminution to that extent of the public funds every year Extraordinary as these results may appear, they are no more than a rigid application to the future of the experience of the post-the only safe method of reasoning that can be practised in political affairs. The Sinking Fund has now reached on extent of which the lustors of no country offords on example, but can we contemplate nathout alarm that prospect of paying off thirty or forty millions annually for the next thirty years, and then suddenly ceasing, which will be the ease under the law as it at present stands, in consequence of the whole debt having been paid off? Such an event would produce effects upon the credit investments of the country, too formidable even for imagination to contemplate. All our financiers, accordingly, have concurred in the necessity of limiting, in some way or other, and at no remote period, this powerful agent of liquidation. By the original Sinking Fund Act of 1786, drawn by Mr Pitt, this limitation was to have taken place as soon as the fund should have occumulated to four millions per annum I lad not that original plan been varied by the act of 1802, the public would long ere this have felt relief from the operation of the Sinking hund, though only to the limited extent of the interest on four millions a-year Lord Lansdowne and all the authorities have also concurred in the opinion, that the idea of paying off thirty or forty millions a-year in time of peace, which the Sinking Fund, if maintained to its present amount, will unquestionably do, is altogether impracticable and visionary Relief must, therefore, at some time or other be afforded to the public, by arresting the oction of the Sinking Fund, and if so, the question occurs, is there any period when such relief is more loudly called for, more imperatively required, than at the present moment?

"Aven the Sinking Fund was established in 1786, the total amount of the debt was about 210,000,000, and the redemption of such a sum appeared, if not altogether hopeless, at least placed at a very remote distance. But, great ed (1). Instead of shifting the burden from themselves, and laying it upon 353 posterity, the people of this country have nobly and manfully supported the load, even under the burden of increasing difficulties, which the vicissitudes of the contest have thrown upon them; and, what is still more remarkable, they have done this during a period when they paid a still greater amount in war taxes, to prevent the growth of another debt of a similar amount during the contest: so that experience has both amply demonstrated the wonderful powers of the Sinking Fund in accumulating funds for the redemption of the debt, and the strong claims which the people of England now have for some relief from the burdens with which it is attended.

"Mr. Pitt not only strongly supported, but was the original author of the Act of 1802; and his original design was, that after reserving as much of the Sinking Fund as would redeem the whole debt at par in forty-five years, the surplus, then amounting to above a million, should be applied to the public service. We have now arrived at the period when a similar relief, without impairing the ultimate efficiency of the Sinking Fund, may be obtained. It is proposed that the debt first contracted should be deemed to have been first discharged; and that the sinking fund created in respect of any subsequent loan shall be first applied to the redemption of any prior loan remaining unredeemed; while the operation of the per-centage created for those earlier loans, shall be continued for the redemption of those subsequently contracted. Thus, in the event of a long war, a considerable resource might accrue during the course of the war itself, as every successive loan would contribute to accelerate the redemption of those previously existing; and the total amount of charge to be borne by the public in respect of the public debt, will be reduced to a narrower compass than under the existing mode, while the period of the ultimate discharge of the whole debt will be accelerated rather than retarded. The calculations which are laid on the table prove, that by the new plan means are provided for the total repayment of the existing debt from four to ten, and of the future debt from fourteen to twentyseven years sooner than by the laws in force, while a very considerable surplus available to our present necessities will at once be obtained. According to the laws at present in force, the whole debt will be discharged by the year 1845, by the new plan in 1857 (2)."

To these specious views, it was answered by Mr. Huskisson and of Mr. Hus-kisson and Mr. Tierney—" The great and peculiar merit of Mr. Pitt's system Mr. Tierney of the Sinking Fund is, that it makes an effectual provision for the permanent liquidation, not only of the existing, but of every future public debt. He wished, in the event of any future war, to guard the country against the evils arising from too rapid an accumulation of debt, and consequent depression of credit; and to place us beyond the reach of that hopelessness, despondency, and alarm, which had brought the finances of the country to the brink of ruin at the close of the American war. But his system has a still greater merit. He foresaw that the greatest difficulty which the statesmen of the country would have to contend with in subsequent periods of difficulty, would be to guard against the danger of future alienation. The plan which he introduced in 1792, was intended to guard against this spe-

⁽¹⁾ Total national funded debt on 5th January 1786, Redeemed before March 1, 1813, L.238,231,248 238,350,143

Overpaid of original debt by,

-Mr. Vansittart's Resolutions, March 3, 1813. Parl. Deb. xxiv. 1092. Overpaid of original debt by, 118,895

⁽²⁾ Parl. Deb. xxiv. 1078, 1095.

cific danger, and it held out to the public a guarantee, that any future debt which the stite might meur, would, how great seever its amount might be, be contracted under a system of redemption, which would mevitably provide for its extinction within a period of thirty years or so after its contraction. Under this admirable system, not only the sinking fund which it provides, but the application and occumulation of that sinking fund are so intervover and bound up with the contract for every loan, that its redemption became a condition between the borrower and lender, until the obligation of repayment was cancelled by the extinction of the debt itself. It was made an objection to this system, that it would place the reimbursement of all future loans beyond the reach or control of Parliament but to every thoughtful observer, this very circumstance is its principal ment, for it placed the linancial silvation of the country beyond the reach even of the future weakness of its rulers or people (4).

"The fundamental position in Mr. Pitt's financial system, the truthof which experience has so completely demonstrated, is, that provision should be made for every loan being redeemed from the resources provided at the time of its contraction, of latest within forty five years. This is not founded upon any imaginary result or chimerical anticipation, but upon a risorous application of arithmetical colculation, and is as certain as any proposition in geometry. He established a sinking fund of one per cent on each loan contracted, for which provision was made in the taxes laid on to pay its interest and it was enacted that this one per cent should be regularly issucd quarterly from Exchequer, to be laid out in the purchase or redemption of stock, to be invested in the name of the commissioners of the Na tional Debt, and it is demonstrably certain, that this system, supposing the rate of interest to be invariably three per cent, will redeem a capital equal to a hundred times its amount in little more than forty five years. This is the fixed and certain rate of redemption at three per cent that is, inhen the three per cent stock is of par but it is a great and peculiar adventige of Mr Pitt's system, that it is calculated to act more powerfully when the price of stock is depressed, by rendering the purchases of the commissioners cheaper, that is, it draws an additional element of life from the very calamities which appear to threaten the existence of the nation

"The foundation of the new system of finance proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, 15, that Parliament is at liberty, under the Act of 4792, to regulate and modify, according to its discretion, in any manner, the redemption of the debt contracted under that net, provided the final liquidation of each of these separate loans, which together constitute the aggregate of the debt, is not protracted beyond the full period of forty-five years. Is such an afteration consistent with public faith? That there is nothing in the act au thorizing such an alteration in the means established for the creditor's security in the progressive liquidation of his debt, is quite apparent. Then, Is there any thing in the nature of the change which calls for its adoption to the face of the express injunctions of the Act to the contrary? It is plain that there is not-nay, that the reason of the thing all lies the other way The invasion upon the Sinking Fund proposed hes here. The new system does not Interfere with the quarterly issue from Exchequer of the one per cent on each loan, as directed by the Act 1792 It is upon the concurrent application of these several one per cents to the reduction of their respective loans, and upon the transfer of the stock purchased by each of these sinking funds, that the change is made. And of the magnitude of this change no clearer proof can be imagined, than that it is held forth by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as likely in the next four years to withdraw seven or eight millions sterling from the Sinking Fund to the necessities of the state; and that in twenty years it would prove equal to a loan of a hundred millions.

"The first report of the Committee of Finance in 1797, concludes with these remarkable words:— 'The old Sinking Fund established in 1786 is no longer made applicable, by law, to the discharge at compound interest of what may then remain of the old debt; but the operation of the new sinking fund is to continue at compound interest till the new debt shall be wholly discharged.' Is it possible to express the object of the Act, and the intention of the legislature more clearly, than by thus drawing the distinction between the Act of 1786 and that of 1792? The promised subsidy of a hundred and twenty millions is merely a golden dream. It is no doubt true, that if we choose to abandon the Sinking Fund, or any considerable part of it, we shall find ourselves so much the richer for present operations by doing so. Every person who is in the course of paving off a debt, will find the same if he stops in the course of its liquidation, and applies all the funds destined for that purpose to his present necessities. There is nothing new in that: it has been the common excuse for wasteful improvidence from the beginning of the world. But what is to be the ultimate result of such a system? Ruin to the state, as it has been to every individual or family who ever yet pursued it.

"The real hait which is held out is, that this system will for the next three years supersede the necessity of laying on new taxes. Admitting the weight of the public burdens, and the painful duty which it is to propose any addition to them, is it not more manly and statesmanlike at once to do so. than to adopt a change in a system which hitherto has worked so admirably and substitute for the steady operation of the Sinking Fund, under the present laws, which experience has so amply demonstrated to be well founded. a succession of new devices, to which no man can foresee an end? If the public necessities render it absolutely impossible to go on without having recourse to some extraordinary aid, it would be far better to mortgage the Sinking Fund to the extent of two millions yearly for the period, it is to be hoped short, that the war lasts, than to adopt a permanent change of system in a particular so vital to the national safety. Any appropriation of the Sinking Fund for a brief period would be preferable to such a lasting alteration on the system, and breaking in upon its efficiency and operation; whereas, by adhering to it with the constancy and resolution which has been hitherto evinced by government, we shall have the absolute certainty that a very few years of peace will accumulate its annual payments to such an amount, that in addition to providing for the reduction of the debt to as large an extent as is desirable, perhaps twenty millions a-year, we shall have the pleasing task to perform, of remitting the most oppressive part of the war taxes. To break in upon a system attended with such benefit, is the most dangerous of all innovations. The present system is neither more nor less than stopping the accumulation of the Sinking Fund just now, to add to it hereafter. Such a precedent, once established, will shake the security of our finances to the foundation—that hereafter will never come. Some exense will always be found for continuing the agreeable task of remitting present taxation by trenching upon the security of the future; and in the end it will be found that the first sten in such a downward system is the first advance to ruin (1)."

356 The resolutions of Mr. Vansitiart were agreed to without a division, and a bill passed in terms thereof (4) Reflections. Thus began the new system of British finance: that of shutting our eyes to the future: of considering only the exigences of the our foan moment; and trenching to any extent mon the interests or the security of subsequent times, provided only a stop can by nut to present elamour, or a foundation laid for temporary nonularity. Time, the great test of truth, has now completely demonstrated the perilons nature of this innovation, and too clearly verified Mr. Tierney's prediction, that it would prove the first sten to national runn. Nor is there, perhaps, to be found in the whole history of human affairs, a more striking proof than the twenty-seven years immediately preceding, and the like period immediately following the year 1815, afford, of the difference between the results of that manly and provident system of government, which, founded on the foresight of the thinking few. lays, often amoust the clamours and inserencesentations of the unthinking from the heedless multitude, by adopting measures which loosen the fabric of national existence, and bring down upon its authors the lasting execuations of the wase and thoughtful in every future age

In the twenty-seven years which classed from 1786 to 1815, the in the restancy, scrupulous regard to the future, and a total disregard of present obloquy, and the consequence was, that the Sinking Fund rose in - 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 years of that period were occupied with the most extensive and costly war that has occurred in the lustery of mankind, and an expenditure had been forced on the country, which increased its revenue raised by taxation, from sixteen millions at its commencement, to sixty-eight millions at its termination. In the twenty-seven years which immediately followed 1815-from 1815 to 1810-a totally different system was followed. Tax after tax, amounting in the whole period to above forty-eight millions sterling, were renealed amidst the general applause of the unthinking many, and the profound indignation of the far-seeing few; Mr. Vansitiart's precedent of breaking in moon 11

shador three

debt; and the nation which had begun the fund with a fixed and certain sinking fund of fifteen millions a-year, in full operation and increasing at comnound interest, found itself at its close without any sinking fund whatever, and a deficit which, during the last three years, had amounted to above at millions (2). This disastrous change occurred, too, during a period, with the exception of the last year of its continuance, of profound and general peace;

(1) Parl Deb 356 367 (2) Tasks I Exhib ting the Progress of the Suking Fund from its Commencement in 1786 to 1813 Money applied to

Stock redeemed in bink og I va i 1.662 "50 At 1st Tebruary 1787, 1.1 000 000 1183 1,503,051 150,000 1753 1 300 350 in the course of which the population of the empire had increased fully fifty per cent, its agricultural produce in a still greater proportion, its imports had nearly, and its exports more than doubled (1)! With truth did Sir Joshua Stock redeemed.	Money applied to redemption of debt in Sinking Fund.

At 1st Teb	. 1790,				_	L. 1,558,850	L. 152,250
	1791.					1,587,500	157,367
	1792,			•		1,507,100	162,479
	1793,					1,962,650	1,834,281
-	1794,	•				2,171 405	1,634,615
	1795,					2,804,945	1,872,957
	1796,					3.083,455	2,143,596
	1797,					4,390,670	2,639,724
	1798,					- 6,790,023	3,369,218
	1799,	3 .				8,102,875	4,294,325
	1800,					10,550,094	4,649,871
-	1801,					10,713,168	4,767,992
-	1802,	•				10,491,325	5,310,511
-	1803,		•		•	9,436,389	5,922,979
-	1804,					13,181,667	6,287,910
-	1805,	•	•		•	12,860,629	6,851,200
-	1800,					13,759,697	7,615,167
-	1807.				•	15,341,799	8,323,329
	1808,					16,064,962	9,179,165
-	1809,		•			16,181,689	10,188,607
_	1810,				•	16,656,643	10,904,451
_	1811,				•	17,881,234	11,660,601
-	1812,	•		•		20,733,354	12,502,860
_	1813,	•		•		24,246,059	13,483,160
-	1814,	•	•	•	•	27,522,230	15,379,262

-Monrau's Tables guen in Pennen, pp. 154 and 247.

II. Typex showing the progressive diminution of the Sinking Fund and growth of the Delicit, from 1813 to 1840—year ending

				Money applied to
		Deficit of	Stock redeemed.	redemption of debt
		Revenue.		in Sinking Pand.
1st Tebruar		L	27,522,230	15,379,262
	1815,		22,559,683	14,120,963
-	1816,		21,001,053	13 452,096
	1817,		23,117,811	1,826,814
– 5th January	1818,	-	19,460,982	1,624,606
	1819,		19,648,469	3,163,130
-	1820,		31,191,702	1,918,018
	1821,		24,518,885	4,104,457
	1822,		23,605,981	2,962,564
_	1823,	-	17,966,680	5,261,725
	1824,	-	4,828,530	6,456,559
_	1825,	' —	10,583,132	9,900,725
	1826,	-	3,313,834	1,195,531
	1827,		2,886,528	2,023,028
	1828,		7,281,414	4,667,965
-	1829,		4,961,807	2,670,003
-	1830,	-	2,732,162	1,935,465
-	1831,		3,469,216	2,763,858
	1832,	-	7,364	5,696
	1833,	-	1,439,261	1,023,784
	1834,	,	2,561,866	1,776,378
_	1835,		1,942,000	1,270,050
	1836,		2,232,142	1,590.727
-	1837,	-	1,932,671	1,252,041
	1838,	1,428,000	-
-	1839,	, 430,000	•
	1840,	1,457,000		-
	1841,	1,851,000
-	1842,	2,456,000

-Moreau's Tables, and Papaen, 247, and Parl. Pap. May 18, 1811; and Finance Accounts or 1837, 1838, 1839, and 1841.

	•	•			1814.	1 x840.
(1) Population of Great Britain and Ireland,					18,000,000	28,350,000
Exports,						L 102,472,000
Imports,					L 33,755,264	L. 61,268,000
Shipping-Tons, British and Foreign,		•			1,889,535
Revenue raised by Taxes,			•		L.68,748,363	L. 47,250,849
PORTER'S Progress of the Nation, i, 11, ii. 9	8 and	'ii,	174	i :	and Imance and	Parliamentary Account

- PORTER'S Progress of the Nation, i, 11, ii. 98 and ii. 174; and Finance and Purlamentary Accounts for 1840.

Reynolds say, that he who aims at obtaining popularity with his contemporaries, must lav his account with the neglect or detestation of posterity.

tion that s n al * neon Iv

Answer to Nor is there any solid foundation for the obvious remark, so often repeated as the justification of government and the people, during this unparalleled increase of national resources and prostration of national strength, that the Sinking Fund redeemed and discharged con ra red debt so largely during the first period, because other debt to a much greater amount was contracted, and that it was gradually impaired, and at last totally annihilated in the second, because the simultaneous contraction of other debt had ceased. This observation, which has been so generally made as to have deluded a whole generation, proceeds upon confounding together two things, in themselves altogether distinct and senarate, viz the provision made by Mr. Pitt for paying off, within forty-five years after it was contracted. every separate loan which his was obliged to borrow, and the simultaneous necessity to which he was exposed of contracting debt to an equal or greater amount, for the necessities of the resolutionary war it is no doubt true, that, if two hundred and forty milhons were paid off before the year 1815, debt to more than double that amount had been contracted, and it is that fact which has so generally misled the last generation. But these two things had no necessary or even casual connexion with each other. The funds provided for the liquidation of the former, were wholly independent of the debts contracted under the necessities of the latter. If the funds for the discharge of the debt had been drawn solely, or even partly, from borrowing, unquestionably the remark would have been well founded, that you in nowise better your condition by borrowing with the right hand to pay off with the left. But this was not the case. The funds provided for the liquidation of the debt were all drawn from indirect peace taxes, and would all have existed, if these taxes had not been repealed, after the mar loans had entirely ceased In private life we are never mistaken in such a case. If a man adopts a regimen which improves and insures his health at ordinary times, we never think of condemning it because he accidentally takes the typhus fever, and, during its continuance, the good effects of the system are overlooked or concealed It is by its operation in seasons independent of such extraneous calamity, that we must judge of its effects, and if the indirect taxes, laid on for the upholding of the Sinking Fund, had not been repealed under the pressure of no necessity, but from a reckless thirst for nonularity on the part of successive governments, nothing is more certain than that the debt paid off would, by the year 1810, have been above six hundred millions, and, instead of a deficit of two millions and a half, we should now have had a sur

I enving these momentous but melancholy considerations, it is now time to resume the narrative of the glorious concluding events of the war

plus of revenue above the expenditure, of forty millions annually (1)

The winter which followed the campaign of Salamanca, though i ic rau not distinguished by any warlike achievements, was one of extramaring ordinary activity and unceasing efforts on the part of Wellington The disasters in which it terminated, as well as the inceasing and protracted fatigues with which it had been attended throughout its long extent, had in a great degree loosened the bonds of discipline and Impaire I the efficiency of the army, and on various occasions, during the siege of Burgos and in the subsequent retreat, it had been observed, that the troops had neither fought with their accustomed spirit, nor gove through their duties with their wonted regularity. Wellington's stern but necessary reproof, which has already been mentioned (1), had done much to remedy the most glaring evils which had crept in; and he was not slow in setting the first example himself of those useful reforms which he so strongly inculcated on others. Neither rank nor station had been able to screen those in fault; some had been tried. others dismissed, many allowed to retire home to avoid more painful consegnences; and with such effect was the vigilant reformation which pervaded all denartments attended, that the second division recovered no less than six hundred bayonets in one month. The ponderons iron camp-kettles hitherto used by the soldiers had been exchanged for lighter ones, similar to those employed in the French service; and the mules which formerly earried them bore tents instead, for the protection of the troops. The Donro had been rendered navigable above the confinence of the Agneda: a ponton train had been formed; carts of a neculiar construction, adapted for mountain warfare, had been formed; and a large supply of mules obtained, to supply the great destruction of those useful animals during the retreat from Burgos. Finally, large reinforcements, especially in cavalry, came out during the winter from England; and before spring arrived, the army, thoroughly recruited in health and vigour during its rest in cantonments, was prepared to take the field in greater strength than it had done since the commencement of the Peninsular war (2).

It was an object of not less importance to take some decisive steps teappointed for the more effectual organization of the Spanish army; and in machines, that quarter at length symptoms of a considerable change were and goes to visible. The colossal fame of Wellington, the magnitude of the services he had rendered to the cause of Peninsular independence, the sight of Andalusia liberated by his victories, of Cadiz disenthralled by his arms, had at length conquered alike the sullen obstinacy of Castilian pride and the 22d Sept. 1812. Secret hostility of democratic jealousy; and the English general was, by a decree of the Cortes, invested with the supreme command of the whole Spanish armies. Such, however, was the disorganized and inefficient state of all the forces of that monarchy, that Mr. Henry Wellesley, Wellington's brother, and the British ambassador at Cadiz, advised him not to accept the office, as it was evident that it would excite jealousy and infer responsibility, without increasing strength or conferring power. The patriotic spirit of the English general, however, and his clear perception of the obvious truth, that it was only by combining the whole strength of the Peninsula under one direction, that the French could be driven across the Pyrences, overcame the repugnance which he felt at undertaking so onerons and irksome a responsibility, and he accepted the high command. The Spanish government, however, soon found that the new commander-in-chief was not to accept the honours of his dignified situation without discharging its duties: he early remonstrated in the most energetic terms against the management of their armies, as calculated to destroy altogether their efficiency in the field (5); and as it was evident that a very strong hand would be required

^{(1) .}Inte, viii 244 (2) Nap. v. 503, 404 Tor v. 130. Jom. iv. 345. (3) "The discipline of the Spanish armies is inthe very lowest state, and their efficiency is in con-sequence much deteriorated. The evil has taken a deeper root, and requires a stronger remedy than the remaral of the causes—viz, want of pay, clothing, and necessaries—which have necessarily occasioned it. Not only are your armies undisciplined and inefficient, and both officers and soldiers insubordinate, from the want of pay, clothing, and necessaries, and the consequent cumarance of misery for a long period; but the habits of imfiscipline and insubordination are such, the thus By rps which by my exertions and fed for a considto remedy such numerous and long established evils, he required that officers should be appointed to command solely on his recommendation, that he should be invested with the absolute power of dismissal, and that the resources of the state, which were applicable to the pay and support of the troops, should be applied as he might direct. As the Cortes evinced some histonian in according to these demands, Wellington repaired in person to Cadiz.

Ballaste
Wijch le

to bla be dep i ed of the party in Cadiz The Diario Mercantil de Cadiz loudly denomiced the measure as illegal, unconstitutional, and disgraceful to the Spanish character, and it speedily railied to its cause all that party, strong in every country, but especially so in Spain, with whom lealousy of foreigners is predominant over love of their own country Such was the clamonr which they Oct 23 raised, that it reached the armies, and Ballasteros, a brave and active, but proud and trascible officer, openly extraced a spirit of insubordination, and wrote to the minister of war, demanding that, before the command was definitively conferred on the English general, the national armies and entizons should be consulted Such an example, if successful, would speedily have proved fatal to the slight bonds of authority which still held together the monarchy, and the regency, sensible of their danger, acted with a vigour and celerity worthy of the cause with which they were entrusted. Don Ildefonso de Ribera, an artillery officer of distinction, was immediately dispatched to Grenada, the headquarters of Ballasteros, to deprive him of his command The dangerous mission was executed with vigour and decision the Prince of Anglona and Sibera, supported by the corps of the guards in his army, summoned the insurgent to resign his command, his appealed to the other corps to resist the order, but they shrank from the prospect of openly braving the supreme authority, and Ballasteros was conducted to Ceuta without bloodshed, where he was detained a prisoner, although a sense of his services, and the popularity of the stand for national command which he had made, induced the government most wisely not to follow up his arrest with any ulterior proceedings (2) terrenar. This unwonted act of vigour on the part of the Spanish governcational ment, however, was the result of offended pride rather than roused patriousm the retreat of Wellington into Portugal soon after renewed the spirit of disaffection in Galiz, intrigue heteame more prevalent than ever, the agents of Joseph were indefatigable in their endervours to represent the cause of independence as now evidently hopeless, and a conspinery for delivering up the island of Leon, and proclaiming the intrusive monarch lying of Spain, was set on foot, and soon acquired a formidable consitency, not only from its ramifications over the monarchy, but its embracing, beyond all question, some of the intrinse friends of the Duke del Infaintal, the president of the regency, and a well known political intrigante, his avowed insistess (3) We have the authority of Napoleon, accordingly, for the assertion, that at that epoch the Cortest retarted in spert with the French.

confidence of the author i es who I are conferred it on me —Wellisson is Don Jones of Cara at Spenish M at a till or 4 h December 1812—(iis woos in 595 597 (i) Well a too to Don Josef de Caras i mis s for at war Dec 4 1812 forwood in 597 Too

ter at war Dec 4 1812 Gurwood in w 122 133

⁽²⁾ Tor v #25 126 hap v 599 400 (3) Tor v 37 40

HISTORY OF THROPE. ICHAP, LXXII.

tions in their own way, to bend their whole attention to the prosecution of the war, and the expulsion of the enemy from the Peninsula (1). On the same principle he strongly recommended to the Cortes to suspend their meditated decree for the abolition of the Inquisition; urging, with reason, that without entering into the direction, whether that institution should be maintained or abolished, and even admitting it should ultimately be abolished, it was to the last degree inexpedient to propose its suppression at that particular time, when half the Spanish territors was still in the hands of the enemy, and any proposal affecting that branch of the church would be sure to ahenate the clergy, who had butherto been the cluef, and latterly the sole supporters of the war. This advice was much too rational to be palatable to men inflamed with the political passions which at that period raced with such fury in the breasts of the Cartes and the nopulace of Cadlz it was recoived, accordingly, in sullen silence; and no sooner was the English general gone, than the dissensions between the two parties broke out with more rancour than ever. Instead of bending their undivided attention to the enemy. who were still at their gates, they were almost wholly engrossed by domestic to of speessant and rapegrous attacks from ie Inquisition was abolished by a formal and as the clergy of Cadir resisted the order, -- 1 41 - stantly blarch & Cesiar, were installed as regents. All the clergy who resisted these violent usurnations were immediately arrested, and thrown into prison in every part of Spain; and the revolutionary press, true to its principles, immediately began to some forth a torrent of abuse against the English government, which had so long supported their country in its misfortunes, and the heroic general and gallant army who were even then preparing to lead them to victory (2). The evacuation of the provinces to the south of the Slerra Moren's BO OF 1 of by the French troops, led to a disclosure of the enormous, and, if not proved by authentic evidence, incredible amount of the contributions levied by their during their occupation of these districts. It is proved by the accounts of the royal commissary of Joseph. the French Count of Montano, that the sums loved on the different communes of Andalusia, from the period of the entry of the French into the country in February

209

4810, till that of their final evacuation of it in August 1812, a period of only two years and a half, amounted to the enormous sum of six hundred millions of reals, or above twelve millions sterling, equivalent, if the difference in the value of money is taken into account, to at least thirty millions sterling in Great Britain (1). When it is recollected that the population of Andalusia at this period did not exceed 1,300,000 souls; that commerce of every kind was entirely destroyed by the war, and occupation of their country by the French troops; and that the whole revenue of the monarchy, before the French invasion, was only 178,000,000 francs, or about 1.7,200,000, sterling (2), it must be confessed that a clearer proof of the oppressive nature of the imperial government cannot be imagined. On the little province of Jaen, to the south of the Sierra Morena, the burdens imposed during the same period were 21,600,000 reals, or above 1,500,000 a-year; while before the war, the whole taxes, direct and indirect, which it paid, were only 8,000,000 of reals, or 1.160,000 a-year. In the end of June 1812, the six prefectures of Madrid, Chenca, Gnadalaxara, Toledo, Cindad Real, and Segovia, which comprised the whole of the districts over which the authority of Joseph really extended, were compelled, in addition to their ordinary imposts, which were equally severe, to furnish an extraordinary contribution of 560,000 fanegas, of which 275,000 fanegas were oats; the value of which in whole was not less than 250,000,000 reals, or L.3,000,000 sterling! Such was the magnitude of this requisition, that it would have reduced the country to an absolute desert if the bayonets of the French had been able to extract it from the cultivators. which fortunately could not be entirely done. Such was the effect of these appressive exactions, that cultivation totally ceased in many parts of the country, and the inhabitants abandoning their homes, lived as guerillas by plunder. All the French marshals were obliged to enjoin the sowing of the fields by positive orders, and under the severest penalties in case of neglect: seed corn, in many cases, had to be provided for this purpose from France; prices rose to an extravagant height; and in Mailrid alone, though the population at that period was not above 150,000, twenty thousand persons died, chiefly of famine, between September 4811 and July 1812, when the English army entered the city. The enormous amount of these contributions, which afford a specimen of the French revolutionary system of government, at once explains how it happened that the Exchequer at Paris was able to exhibit such flattering accounts of the state of its finances, so far as they were drawn from the internal resources of the empire; how the imperial rule was so long popular among those who profited by this spoliation; and how it excited such universal and unbounded exasperation among those who suffered from it (5).

Above to the processing and a bounds of the period of the same and a bounds mixture of arrogance and imbecility which had distinguished them station of Portugal. in every period of the war; and it was only by the incessant efforts of Wellington, aided by the able and energetic exertions of the English minister at Lisbon, Sir Charles Stewart, that the resources of the country could be extricated from private pillage, to be brought forward for the public service. During the absence of the English general in Spain, all the old abuses were fast reviving, the sad bequest of centuries of corruption: the army in the field received hardly any succours; the field artillery had entirely disappeared; the cavalry was in miserable condition; the infantry reduced in numbers, desertion frequent, pay above six months in arrear, and despondency general. Nor was the civil administration on a better footing than the militars service. The rich and powerful inhabitants, especially in the great cities, were suffered to evade the taxes and regulations for drawing forth the resources of the country for the miltary service: While the defenceless husbandmen were subjected to verations oppression, as well from the collectors of the revenue, as the numerous military detachments and convoys which traversed the country. The protation produced by these causes was eagerly made use of by the malcontent demoeratic party, which, eager to obtain the nower and consideration which was enjoyed by the republicans of Gadiz. lost no opportunity of inflaming the public mind against the English administration, and even went so far as to accuse Wellington of aspiring to the Spanish crown, and aiming at the subjugation of the Peninsula, for the purposes of his criminal ambition. But the English general, conscious of his innocence, simply observed, that "Every leading man was sure to be accused of criminal personal ambition; and, if he was conscious of the charge being false, the accusation did no harm " Disregarding, therefore every nerve to recruit tion, and provide func

⁽¹⁾ The real is .54 of a franc, or somewhat below sixpence, Luglish money.—Ball, Geog. Unic. p. (2) Malte Brun, viii. 133, 134. sixpence, Luglish money.—Ball, Geog. Unic. p. (3) Tor. v. 43, 44, 99, 100. 1226.

Marshal Beresford in the military, and Sir Charles Stewart in the civil service, that, despite oil the resistance they met with from the interested local

Sir Charles elecked the panic, by guaranteeing payment of the bills, and granting interest till the payment was made. At the same time, the vigorous measures of Beresford checked the describing from, and restored the efficiency of the army, the militamen fit for service were drafted into the line; all the artillerymen in the fortresses were forwarded to the army, and their place supplied by ordinance guinners; and the worst cavalry regiments were reduced, and their men incorporated with those in a more efficient state. By dressed a memorial on the subject to the Prince Regent in Brazil, which remains an enduring monument of the almost incredible difficulties with which he lied to contend, in preparing the means of carrying on his campaigns against the French armse in the Fernisala (I).

Number 1st Mineral Is and as the condition, knowever, of the Portuguese troops was, that of the Spanish armies was still more deplorable; the unavoidable Syrands Syrands and Spanish armies was still more deplorable; the unavoidable syrands and the Spanish armies was still more deplorable; the unavoidable syrands and the Spanish armies was still more deplorable; the unavoidable syrands and the Spanish armies was still more deplorable; the unavoidable syrands and the spanish armies was still more deplorable; the unavoidable syrands armies and the spanish armies was still more deplorable; the unavoidable syrands armies armies and the spanish armies was still more deplorable; the unavoidable syrands armies armi strain result of the occupation of so large a portion of the country by the enemy's forces, and the entire absorption of the attention of all classes in Ca-

war : it e mercantile this lave enr ched themselves by the large disbursame its which it e army makes in me ey; but the customs paid at Lisbon and Dporto, and the 10 per craf lev ed on the incurses of

⁽¹⁾ Wellington to Prince Region of Parturyl, April 22, 1813 Care x 223 Apr 4 15 413 "The Irs sport service slaves belower Bill? When we look the felt has been acreer regul riy when we look the felt has been acreer regul riy To these or it is have structs to tas sto cell the about too too a new compally with Ir my a low shown great the acress of the partury of the principles of the ter acress of the years of the principles of the same ter acress of the years of the partury of the partury of the ter acress of the years of the partury of the p diz with objects of personal ambition or political innovation, without any attention to the main object, the paying, equipping, and feeding of their troops. Their armies, indeed, were numerous, and the men not deficient in spirit; but they were for the most part ill-disciplined, and totally destitute of clothing, stores, magazines, and organization of any kind. Their condition was thus painted at the moment by a master-hand, who had had too much reason to be acquainted with the facts which he asserts:—"There is not a single battalion or squadron in the Spanish armies in a condition to take the field; there is not in the whole kingdom of Spain a depôt of provisions for the support of a single battalion in operation for one day; not a shilling of money in any military chest (1). To move them forward at any point now, against even inconsiderable bodies of the enemy, would be to insure their certain destruction."

Torces with By indefatigable excitions, however, these evils, so far as the sup-which Wel-ling is war plies and reinforcements for the army were concerned, were overprepared to come; and Wellington, in the beginning of May, was prepared to take the field with a much larger and more efficient force than had ever yet been assembled around the English banner since the commencement of the war. Nearly two limited thousand Allied troops were in readiness in the whole Peninsula; and although not more than the half of this great force were English, Germans, or Portuguese, upon whom reliance could really be placed, yet the remainder, being now under the direction of Wellington, and acting in concert with his army, proved of the most essential service, by taking upon them the duty of maintaining communications, gnarding convoys, blockading fortresses, and cutting off light and foraging parties of the enemy; thereby leaving the Anglo-Portuguese force, in undiminished strength, to maintain the serious conflict in the front of the advance. What was almost an equal advantage, this great force, which, in the course of the campaign, came to stretch across the whole Peninsula, from the sources of the Ebro in Biscay, to its junction with the ocean, was supported on either flank by a powerful naval force, the true base of offensive operations for Great Britain, which at once secured supplies without any lengthened land carriage, and protected the extreme flanks of the line from hostile assault (2).

This immense force, which now, for the first time in the history of the war brought the British army to something like an equality with the imperial legions to which they were opposed, was thus distributed. The noble Anglo-Portuguese army, now mustering seventy-five thousand combatants, of whom forty-four thousand were British, with ninety guns and six thousand horse, was on the Portuguese frontier, near the sources of the Coa, burning with ardour, and ready at a moment's warning to start against the enemy, over whom they already anticipated a decisive victory. The Anglo-Sicilian army, under Sir John Murray, was at the extremity of the line, in the neighbourhood of Alicante, and numbered sixteen thousand men, of whom eleven thousand were English and King's German Legion, upon whom reliance could be placed, and the remainder foreign troops, chiefly from the Mediterranean, in the British service. Copons' Spaniards, six or eight thousand strong, occupied the mountain country and upper ends of the valleys in Catalonia, and might be expected to co-operate with Murray in the operations on the Lower Ebro. Elio's men, twenty thousand in number, were behind Murray in Murcia; but they were as yet in a very inefficient state, and could not be trusted in presence of the enemy. The third army, under the Duke del Parque mustered twelve thousand combat ints, who were posted in the defiles of the Sierra Morena. The first army in the reserve under the Conde d'Absabal was in Andalusa, and consisted normally of fifteen thousand men, but the greater part were mere raw recruits, who were wholly unfit for active service. The only Spanish force upon which reliance could really be placed, was the fourth army under Castanos in Tstremadura, and on the frontiers of Leon and Gallicia, which was destined to oct in conjunction with the grand army under Vellington. It included the Spanish divisions in Estremadura, the Gallicians under Girm, the Asturians under Porlier, and the guerilas of Mina and Longa. It embraced the whole troops able to take the held in the west and north west of Spain, and mustered forty thousand combatants, who, though not equal to the encounter of the French in regular conflicts, were for the most part old soldiers, mured to hardship, and trained to irregular warfare, and who rendered in consequence, important service in the course of the entire of the Posts and The French forces in the Peninsula, though considerably reduced a reag h of by the drafts which the necessities of Napolton, after the disasters of Russia, compelled him to make from his veteran legions in that the le in quarter, were still very formidable and exhibited a sum total of combatants, both superior in number to, and incomparably more concentrated and better disciplined than the greater part of, the allied forces. Tho most nowerful part of it consisted of the army commanded by Joseph in person, which, by drawing together the whole disposable military power of the French in the Peninsula, had compelled Wellington to execuate the Sponish territors in the close of the last campaign. Their whole force, which, at the termination of the retreat into Portugal, was still two hundred and sixty thousand strong, was now reduced by the drafts into Germany, in March 1815, to two hundred and therty one thousand, of whom twenty-nine thousand were horse. Of these, only me hundred and ninety-seven thousand were present with the eagles, and sixty-eight thousand were under Suchet in Aragon, Valencia, ond Catalonia Of the remainder, ten thousand were at Madrid, eight thousand were in Old Castile and Lean to watch the motions of the Auglo-Portuguese army, and the rest, to the number of forty thousand, preserved the communications in the northern provinces, and maintained a painful partizan warfare with the insurrection, which had now assumed a very serious character, in Bisery and Navarre (2)

The fact of a function of the French forces were thus superior in numerical worker amount, and greatly stronger from their concentrated position, localists and progressions and a function described by the fact of the fact mogeneous character, and uniform discipline, than the multifa-

(1) Nap v 505 506 Viet et Cong axii 213 to 186 Viet et Cong axii 233 Nap Tor v 233 236 Well agrouto S 27 Grahan April v 505 500 Imperial Muster-cells Ibid 618 7 1813 Over x 270

Imperial Vaster Bolls of the A m es or Sya n 15th Storch 1813

			Present	und r
			Aru	193	Detached			Total
			N n	Horses	Men	Rorses	Hospitals	Men	Casty	Trate.
Army of the South			36 503	6 602	2 050	1 617	7 141	4. 809	8,630	2 601
Aru y of the Ceure			16 227	1.766	910	76	3 401	19 566	270	451
Army of Portugal			34 525	1 624	657	_	7 731	42713	87 6
Army of Atra-un			20 313	4 8.12	55	-	2 412	3. 213	6 173	1 709
Ar ny of Catalon a			27 323	1 169	110	-	2013	21415	1 834	633
Army of the North,	•		40 4 8	1 878	41	_	8 032	48 517	3 171
Army of Payouar .	•		2 811	55	80	_	631	6 591	75	21
		•
Tale								211 110	20 177	9 175

rious host of the Allies to which they were exposed, yet there were many causes which tended to depress their spirit, and brought them into the field with much less than their wonted vigour and animation. It was universally felt that they had been worsted in the last campaign; that they had lost half. and the richest half of Spain; and that their hold of the remainder had been every where loosened. The charm of their invincibility, the nubroken series of their triumnlis, was at an end: the soldiers no longer approached the English but with secret feelings of self-distrist, the necessary consequence of repeated defeats; their chiefs, dreading to measure swords with Wellington. became nervous about their responsibility; and, anticipating defeat, were chiefly solicitons to discover some mode of averting the vials of the imperial wrath, which they were well aware would burst on their heads the moment intelligence of disaster reached Napoléon. Co-operation there was none between the leaders of their armies. Suchet was jealous of Soult, and yielded a tardy obedience to the commands of Joseph himself; Jourdan, who commanded the army of the centre, was a respectable veteran, but wholly nuequal to the task of meeting the shock of Wellington at the head of eighty thousand men; and Soult, though a most able man in strategy and the preparations for a campaign, had shown himself at Allmera unequal to the crisis of a serious hattle: he laboured, also, under heavy suspicions on the part of his royal master, and he had been called to Germany to assist in stemming the torrent of misfortune on the Elbe. The disasters of the Moseow campaign were known, the fatal twenty-ninth bulletin had been published, and its effects had become painfully visible in the march of a considerable part of the army across the Pyrenees, to be replaced only by raw battalions of conscripts, very different from the bronzed veterans who had departed. Thus the army had lost both its consistency and its spirit; its generals were at variance with each other, and each solicitons only for the objects of his separate province; and its supreme direction, divided between the distant commands, often found wholly inapplicable on the spot, of Napoleon, and the weaker judgment of Joseph and Jourdan, was little ealenlated to stem the torrent of disaster accumulating round a sinking empire and a falling throne (1).

It had been the sage policy of Wellington, during the winter which on the east coast of the Peninsula. so far as it was possible, at a distance from the enemy; and rather to permit considerable districts meanwhile to be ravaged by the enemy's troops, than to run the hazard of hlasting all the prospects of the campaign, hy exposing his own ill-disciplined levies to certain destruction, by heing prematurely brought into conflict with their veteran legions. On this principle, he had resolutely withstood the repeated instances of the minister of war at Cadiz, who had urged him to move forward the Duke del Parque's forces from the Sierra Morena, to rescue from devastation the southern provinces of La Mancha. Operations first commenced on the eastern coast of Spain, where Sir John Murray had landed at Alicante in the end of February, and hastened to put the army on a better footing than it had as yet attained; for so little had the British Government profited by their experience of the bad effect of a change of commanders at the time of the battle of Vimiera, that no less than three different generals were called to the direction of the army in Murcia within four months. By the united efforts of Murray and Elio, the allied army was soon put into a more efficient condition, and was found to amount to twenty-seven thousand infantry, three thousand horse, with thirty-seven guns. Deeming himself now in sufficient force to commence active operations, the English general moved forward from Abcoute towards Valencia, in four columns, and after some inconsiderable skermishes, approached Suchet's intrenched camp behind the Nucar, but finding it too strong to risk an assault, he concentrated the bulk of his troops at CASTALIA, while a division of British troops under Roche was dispatched to Alicante, with orders to embark and endeavour to make itself master of Valencia, which was defended only by a garrison of a thousand infantry and eight hundred horse, while the attention of Suchet and the main hody of his forces was occurred by the operations in the interior on the \mear(1)

⁽¹⁾ Vict. et Cong. xxii. 241, 242. Belm. i. 248, 249.

368 35a--1- 6

Suchet at this period had ceased to make Valencia his stronghold post on of and place d'armee, and had transferred his principal magazines and a specod military stores to Saguntum, the fortifications of which he had repaired and strengthened with the utmost care, and which was now become a most formidable point of detence. He had forty thousand admirable veterans under his command, and thirty thousand more occurred the fortresses and level parts of Catalonia, from whom reinforcements could be drawn to resist any serious attack, but as his chief reliance for provisions was still placed on the great agricultural plains of Aragon, and the commitmention from thom was much intercepted by the guerilla parties, a large part of this force required to be stationed in the rear, to keep up his communications. and he could not muster more than sixteen thousand infantry and two thousand horse, with thirty guns, for active operations beyond the \ucar These, however, were all tried veterars, who had never vet suffered defeat, and whose confidence was far from being brolen, as that of the troops opposed to Wellington had been, by repeated disasters Though Valencia was nominally the seat of Suchet's power, yet it was now incanable of defence. he had razed all the external defences erected by the Spamards, and confined his hold to the old walls. His real scat of power was Saguntium, to connect which with Tortosa he had strongly fortified Oronesa and Peniscola on the sca-coast, and established a line of blockhouses for infantry in the interior, through Morilla to Megninenza. In the double range of mountains beyond tho Auear, at Vativa and Moxente, he had established an intrenched camp, which, though not strongly fortified, was very susceptible of defence from the natural strength of its situation, and he had strong outposts at Biar and Castalla, to observe and retard the advance of the allied troops (2)

I celling himself thus secure from the quality of his troops, and the bants the strength of the position on which he might, in ease of need, fall the way and aware, also, that Murray's allyance was part of the general plan of Wellington to force the French across the Ebro, Suchet resolved to assume the offensive, as soon as he learned that the detachment of Roche had been sent to Aheante. He was the more encouraged to do this, as Lord William Bentinck, alarmed at the dissensions in Sicily, and the threats of a descent by Murat, recalled the troops sent to Alicante to menace Valencia, for the defence of that island, and thus rendered entirely abortive

⁽¹⁾ No. v 4.1 4.7 \ ct et Conq vxil _51 255 Tor v 250 251 (2) Suckets \ \text{tm is 303 305 \ \ap v 4.0 451 Tor v 251

Burden Sochelawl ale troops were et il ed fel

there gover ment was more uparally the next for nexts all fest admand tered of any fithe french nexts all fest admand tered of any fithe french nexts as Spa a" — See M as a da Mare chal Security in 221, 225

the project of a double attack on the posts of the French general. April 6. Roche's English troops having embarked for Minorca in the first week of April, Suchet concentrated his troops and attacked the Spanish advanced guard at Yecla, which immediately fell back; but being overtaken in its retreat hy Ilarispe's division, was totally defeated, with the loss of two hundred killed and fifteen hundred prisoners. On the same day the Spanish garrison of Villena, eight hundred strong, were made prisoners, from Elio's obstinate refusal to obey Murray's order to withdraw it. Murray upon this concentrated his troops, and leaving Colonel Adam with the rearguard in front of the pass of Biar, withdrew the main body of his army through that rugged defile, and took post on strong ground about three miles above the upper end of the pass; the Spaniards under Whittingham forming the left, on the rugged sierra of Castalla; the right, composed of Clinton's British division and Roche's Spaniards, on the low ground, with the bed of a torrent in their front; and the town and old castle of Castalla, on a conical hill in the centre, being occupied by Mackenzie's division, and all its approaches strongly guarded by artillery (1).

Emboldened by the early and rapid success of his arms against the Castalla, and Spaniards, Suchet, after much hesitation, determined to attack the British in their position, and for this purpose to force the pass of Biar. Adam's advanced guard, consisting of two Italian regiments, a British battalion, and two troops of foreign hussars, assailed by greatly superior forces, retreated, bravely fighting, up the pass: the French pursued with great vigour, their skirmishers swarming up the rocky acclivities on either side with extraordinary agility and resolution; it was the counterpart of the forcing of the defile at Rolica by the British, in the commencement of the Peninsular war (2). Alarmed at this success of the enemy, by which he lost two guns, Murray, notwithstanding the strength of his position, gave orders for a retreat; but fortunately for the honour of England, the attack commenced before it could he carried into execution, and Suchet for the first time in his life was taught the quality of British troops (5). The ascent on the left, where Whittingham's Spaniards were posted, was so rugged that it was with great difficulty that the steep was surmounted: slowly, however, the French gained ground, and in some places reached the summit, and were proceeding along it when they met the 27th regiment, who, lying down concealed among the rocks (4), suddenly sprang up and gave them such a volley, within pistol shot, as sent the whole headlong, with dreadful loss, down the side of the ridge. The attack on the other points was, in like manner, repulsed by the steady valour of the English and German troops; and at length, Suchet, despairing of success, drew off his men in great confusion towards the pass of Biar.

Now was the time for the Allies to have advanced in pursuit: the narrow defile, three miles long, was in Suchet's rear, and in endeavouring to get back through the gorge, all his guns, and probably part of his army, would have been taken by a vigorous enemy thundering in nursuit. Donkin (5), the

(5) Afterwards Sir Rufanc Donkin, a most gallant and enterprizing officer.

⁽¹⁾ Nap, v. 461, 462. Viet. et Conq. axii. 255.

Tor. v. 252, 253.

(2) Ante, vii. 285.

(3) Viet. et Conq. xxii. 256, Sir J. Murray's account, April 13, 1813. Gurw. x. 353. Tor. v. 254.

Suchet, ii. 307. (4) An event happened here, which recalls the heroie ages of the iliad or Amadis de Gaul. As the French were deploying their columns, a grenadier officer, advancing alene, challenged any English officer to single combat. The offer was immediately accepted by Captain Waldron of the 27th, who sprang out of his company to meet him; the hostile lines looked on without firing a shot, and at the first encounter the Frenchman's head was eleft asunder, The 27th with a loud shout brought flown their arms, and gave the volley which hurled the French down the steep.—Nar. v. 465.

quartermaster-general, who clearly saw that the decisive moment had ar-whole into irretrievable confusion in its narrow windings, and given the British, in their first essay in the east of the Peninsula, a triumph as decisive. though with inferior hodies of men, as those of Hohenhoden or the Katzbach numalested. The consequence was, that Suebet brought off his whole cuns and ammunition waggons, but such had been the close and deadly fire of the British troops, that in the previous action he lost eighteen hundred men. and, what was of still more importance, his moral influence was materially weakened by having suffered a defeat in his first serious encounter with the British troops (1)

After this defeat. Suchet resumed his position in his intrenched campa and Murray; neakened by the loss of Roche's British troops, who had been recalled by Lord William Bentinek, did not feel himself in sufficient strength to resume offensive operations in that quarter till the battle of Vittoria garo a new complexion to the war.

Though Wellington had anxiously enjoined the whole Spanish Operations generals, in every part of the Peninsula, to abstain from hostilities, and withdraw as much as possible from the attacks of the enemy. vet it was impossible to carry these directions implicitly into execution in the northern provinces A most formidable insurrection, as already mentioned (2), had broken out in Biscay, upon occasion of the concentration of the French troops after the battle of Salamanca, which had been powerfully become much more experienced and systematic in their operations, their hands in the interior had swelled into small armies, they possessed several fortified posts on the coast, which enabled them to communicate at pleasuro longer composed of reckless and desperate characters, who had been ruined by the events of the war, but embraced young men of the best families, who had lutherto taken no part in the contest, but whom the dreadful severities of Marshal Bessières had drawn forth into the ranks of their country (3) Biscay alone several battalioos, each a thousand strong, of this description had been formed, and so completely had they succeeded in intercepting the communication along the great road from Bayonne to Madrid, that Joseph only received his despatches of the 4th January on the 18th March, and then liv the circuitous route of Barcelona and Valencia (4).

^{(1) 9} r J Morray's account, April 14 1113

[&]quot;If relaforcements do not speedily arrive in Assure, I shall not be surprised at any extistrophe that may occur. The intolence of the Iregards proves the confidence they feel in their operations. I am ounted it has pour been so great Their erof the country, Is complete; it is difficult to exteernal denots and magazines, in order to denrive them of the means of car-to deal with from the general who, during the winter, non permitted so serious an insurrection to grow up in the mountain districts (%)

Clausel repaired early in the middle of March to Bilboa, which Chancel - * after some sharp strongholds in the March 15 neighbourhood of Duran, u. and domestic, segan his preparations for the siege of Castro, the most important stronghold which they nossessed on the coast, and by which they constantly communicated with the English slups of war. While he was so engaged, however, Bilboa April t was again threatened by the partidas, and very nearly fell into their hands Mina defeated one of his columns near Leria, with the loss of eight hundred men; the same enterprizing chief had made himself master of Anell & > coast of et and s of the tl a face visions, and while Palombini, with six thousand men, commenced in our case Foy, with ten thousand, covered the operations; and he himself, with thirteen thousand, took post at Puenta la Reyna, in Aavarre, to make head land of insurgents in that quarter. ere worsted, and at length

' ie valley of Roncal, with a thousand killed or wounded, the remainder dispersed, and the chief himself escaped with only fourteen men. He soon reassembled his scattered band, however, and near Ler valry; but still the dispersion of ' lowered the spirit of the insurger

ters at Pamneluna, succeeded in pacifying several of the valleys of Majarre, Meanwhile, Eistro was carried by storm, and Sarrut, following up Appoleon's instructions, pushed forward against the denots and magazines of the Biscavan insurgents, and nearly destroyed three of their finest battalions. But though this brilliant success attended the I rench arms on the coast and in Aavarre, it was wellnigh balanced by the advantages gained by the enemy, who, during the absence of the main forces of the - fall man il a highrand from Bayonne to the carrisons to the erminable warfare, Shulu, .

declared it would require fifty thousand men and three months to put down

^{(1) &}quot;The partidat are strong organ ted and are conded by the general cauditation produced by the battle of salumanca. The instructed man joints have battle of salumanca the instructed and joints have been constructed, it is posts on the tea salam ound by defensive you must adopt a contrary system; at tack auddenly, pursue raps liys aun at the boxmard a magazines deputs of arm , and bospits at d sorganize the insurrection and ove or two ties u sorganize the incurrection and one or fee it for Erser will postly the whole tenuity "-\texts Alea in Caresta, D & Feb. 1813 Acr v 450 (2) Nay v, 155 487 Aspoleen to Clause Feb. 7, 1813 find, v, 455.

the northern insurrection; and Napoléon bitterly complained that all the successes of Foy, Sarrut, and Polombini, had brought neither safety to his convoys nor regularity to his conviers (1).

But greater events were now on the wing; the chiefs on both sides repaired to their respective headquarters, and the unitual concenfield, and his tration of troops bespoke the approach of serious warfare. Joseph, operations, who had quitted Madrid in the middle of March with his guards, had subsequently fixed his headquarters at Valladolid, from whence he had detached the divisions Foy, Tanpin, Sarrut, and Barbot, to aid Clansel in the reduction of Biscay and Navarre. This large deduction from the main army was attended with the most important effects in the course of the campaign; for Wellington was now concentrating his forces, and the progress of spring having provided ample forage for his horses, he was prepared to march. Never had the army been so mimerons or so healthy, never its spirits so high: twenty thousand men had rejoined their ranks since the troops went into winter-quarters in December, and the meanest drummer was inspired with the belief that he was about to march from victory to victory, till the French eagles were chased across the Pyrences. Wellington's plan was to move the left wing of his army across the Donro, within the Portuguese frontier; to march it up the left bank of that river, as far as Zamora, and then crossing the Esla, unite it to the Gallician forces; while the centre and left, advancing from the Agueda by Salamanea, forced the passage of the Tormes, and drove the French entirely from the line of the Donro, towards the Carrion. Constantly threatening them in flank by the left wing, which was to be always kept in advance, he thus hoped the enemy would be driven back by Burgos into Biscay, and he himself would succeed in establishing there a new basis for the war, resting on the unmerous and fortified seaports on the coast, and supported by the gallant mountaineers, who in such strength had maintained through the winter a bloody and equal contest with the enemy. In this way, while he advanced his forces, and drove back the enemy towards their own frontiers, he would at once draw nearer to his own resources, and intercept the whole communications of the enemy. This project was attended with this obvious danger, that the army being divided into two grand divisions, with great ranges of mountains and impassable rivers between them, either was exposed to the risk of a separate attack from the whole forces of the enemy; but Wellington relied with reason for the means of obviating this danger, upon the strong nature of the country to which either might retire in case of danger, the high spirit and admirable discipline of his troops, and the universal fidelity of the peasantry, which prevented his designs from becoming known to the enemy (2).

March of Wellington into Spain. Were at Ciudad Rodrigo. Ample employment for Suchet was at the were at Ciudad Rodrigo. Ample employment for Suchet was at the same time secured, hy directions sent to Sir John Murray to embark his troops, and, landing in Catalonia, commence the siege of Taragona; a hridge equipage was prepared for the passage of the Douro; the army of the Duke del Parque advanced from the Sierra Morena into La Mancha, and that of the reserve in Andalusia broke up from Seville on the 12th, and on the 24th was to be at the bridge of Ahnarez, so as to threaten Madrid and the provinces in the centre of Spain; and preparations were made, as soon as the columns reached the frontiers of Biscay or Gallicia, for throwing off the communications with Lisbon, and drawing the whole supplies of the army from the meaner barbours of these northern provinces. Seventy thousand English and Portuguese, and twenty thousand Spaniards were so disposed, that they were all to bear in front or flank on the surprised and disjointed columns of the enemy, who would be forced back, it was hoped, in confusion into the passes of the Pyrences Hope pervaded every bosom, loy beat high in every heart . the veterans marched over the seenes of their former glory, the halo of twenty victories playing round their bayonets, the new soldiers burned with desire to emulate their well-carned fame. The English commander shared the general exultation, and so confidently did he anticipate the defeat of the enemy, and the permanent transference of the seat of war to the portly of the Peninsula, that, in passing the stream which marks the frontier of Spain, he rose in his stirrups, and waving his hand, exclaimed-" Firewells Portugal (1) 121

⁽¹⁾ Nop. v. 489, 502. Belm. i. 251. Tor v. 238, Gurw. x. 357. Nap. v. 567, 569, Belm. i. 252. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 243.

⁽²⁾ Wellington to Lord Bathurst, May, 5, 1813.

the strange. The march of the Duke del Parque's army and the reserve from by C lad Andalusia, which commenced ten days earlier than that of the Salamace grand army of Wellington, to give them time to get forward before the latter moved, was attended with the very best effect, for they spread the plarm in Madrid and New Castile before the direction of the march of the British army could be known, and, by inducing the belief that a combined attack on the crinital was intended, prevented that concentration of force on the Unner Ebro by which alone the march of the British general could have been arrested. Accordingly, when the centre and right of the English army were advancing from Cuidad Rodrigo to the Douro, and Graham, with the left in advance, was toiling through the Tris-os-Montes, not more than therty-five thousand men, with o hundred guns, were concentrated at Volladolid, and the whole French posts at Madrid, and in the valley of the Tagus, were in alarm, expecting an immediate attack in that quarter. Thus, when danger really threatened from the side of Salamanca, no means of resisting it existed, the line of the Tormes was at once obandoucil, with some loss to the retreating army was crossed by them at Zumora, and passed the Esla by the fords, and the Zamora, and at Toro Wellington himself, who had set off in advance of his troops, passed the river at Miranda, by means of a hisket slung on a rone stretc' the fearing torr through the mo perseverance, se them all forty

in ten days, through two hundred miles on the most broken and rugged country in the Peninsula, and on the 5d June the whole army was in communication on the northern bank of the Douro, between Toro and the rater

Lsla (2) This formidable concentration of troops to the north of the Bouro, Perr str in a line at right angles to the position which they had lutherto ocent the enpeed fronting the English general, rendered the further stay of the French army in the neighbourhood of Valladolid impossible, and a hasty ill-arranged retreat was commenced to the Upper Libro Valladolid, with considerable stores of ammun tion, was occupied on the 4th On

On 1 and 253 251 Well agree to level to furni (i) h ; v 512 513 Welling on so I of Ta thurst 25 h Way 1813 Germ x 3 2 (2) hay r = 0 505 Ref : 1 232 223 A et et the 7th and 8th, the British army, rapidly pursuing, crossed the Carrion at various points; and pressing forward with conquering violence, and in the highest spirits at seeing the enemy thus receding before them, soon arrived at the scenes which they had passed under such disastrous circumstances, at the commencement of the retreat from Burgos, in the close of the preceding campaign. Joseph at first thought he should be in a condition to give the enemy battle on the elevated plateaux around that stronghold, and he had now assembled fifty-five thousand men, including nine thousand excellent horse, and a hundred guns; but the force of the inundation was too great to be thus stopped: a hundred thousand men were on his front and flank; for the guerillas of Navarre and Biscay had now drawn together in the vicinity of the British army, and rumour, as usual exaggerating the danger, had magnified their amount to a hundred and ninety thousand combatants. The French retreat, therefore, was continued without intermission to the Ebro; the eastle of Burgos, the theatre of such desperate strife in the former campaign, was blown up with a frightful explosion, and with such precipitation that three hundred French soldiers, defiling under its walls at the time, were crushed by the falling ruins; and the enemy, in deep depression, continued their retreat towards VITTORIA. With mingled astonishment and exultation, the allied troops triumphantly marched through the scenes of their former struggles and defeat (1). "Clausel's strong position, Dubreton's thundering eastle, had disappeared like a dream; and sixty thousand veteran soldiers, willing to fight at every step, were hurried with all the tumult and confusion of defeat across the Ebro."

Confusion and absorder In abandoning Burgos, Joseph took the road for Vittoria, by Pancorvo and Miranda del Ebro; but the consequences of this precipitate retreat now became painfully apparent, and it was evident to the whole army, that it would be impossible, when pressed by a victorious enemy in rear, to engage the troops in the defiles of the Pyrenees, encumbered as they were with baggage and spoil, not of a province but a kingdom. Under the error produced by this unlooked-for and overwhelming force suddenly thrown on their line of communication with France, the whole French troops and civil authorities had evacuated Madrid, and taken refuge under shelter of the army: and the road from that capital to Bayonne was encumbered with an endless file of chariots, carriages, and waggons, which bore away the helpless multitude and rich stores of spoil towards the frontier. The French army thus encumbered, exhibited a lively image of those hosts which the luxury of Asiatic warfare has in every age accumulated round the standards of their sultauns: for the riches which they carried with them were such as bespoke the regal state of a great monarchy; and the train of civil functionaries, officers of state, and ladies of pleasure, who followed the troops, rcealled rather the effeminacy of oriental magnificence, than the simple but iron bands of European warfare (2).

Productions success of Wellington's march continuated in his constantly keeping his left wing in advance, and by to Vittoria. That means continually pressing round the right flank of the French; and in that way, coupled with a constant pressure in front, he compelled them to evacuate every successive position, how strong soever, which they took up between Burgos and the Ebro. The British troops, in pursuing a triumphant advance through this rocky and mountainous country, were never weary of expressing their astonishment at the prodigious strength of the positions which were abandoned, and the numerous rocky defiles traversed only by single arches, which retarded but by o few hours the advance of " allied army They were ignorant of the simultaneous pressure round the right wing of the French, which was going forward from the advance of Graham with the British left wing, and that the most alarming accounts were constantly received at the French headquarters of the progress of the allied troops in that direction On the 15th, Graham pursued his indefatigable march through the hills at the sources of the Ebro, and on the 14th, passed that river at the bridge of Rockamund and San Martin At the same time, the Spanish guerillas from Biscay crowded in great numbers to the same quarter, and occupied all the passes in the great mountains of Reynosa which he between the Ebro and the sea-coast. The effects of this decisive managive where, that not only was the French main army obliged to abandon all the successive positions which it took up on the great road, but the whole seacoast of Biscay, with the exception of Bilboa and Santon, was evacuated by the enemy, and the British vessels of war, amidst the enthusiastic shouls of the inhabitants, entered all the harbours. A depot and hospital station was immediately established at Santander, the whole supplies of the army were directed thither, a new base of operations was established close to the scene of the coming contest, and Portugal, like a heavy tender whose aid was no longer required, was cut away and forgotten Meanwhile the sweep of the Allies round the extreme French right was continued with inhibated vigour, the whole crest of the mountains, between the Ebro and the sea, was soon in their possession, the scarlet uniforms were to be seen in every valley, and the stream of war, descending with impetuous force down all the clefts of the mountains, burst in a hundred feaming terrents into the basin of Vittoria With such accuracy were the marches of all the columns calculated, and with such precision were they carried into effect by the admirable troops, inneed to war and all its fatigues, which Wellington commanded, that every thing happened exactly as he had arranged before he set out from Portugal, and the troops all orrived at the stations assigned them, in the prophetic contemplation of their chief, in the neighbourhood of Vittoria, at the very time when the French army, heavy laden and dejected, had accumulated its unmense files of chariots and baggage-waggons, under the charge of seventy thousand men, in the plain in front of that town (1)

⁽¹⁾ Nap. v 537, 541. Vict. et Couq. xxii. 215.' (2) Vict. et Couq. xxii. 245. Tor. v. 261, 265, Wellington to Lord Batharst, June 13, 1813 Gurw. 267. Napier, v. 388, 541. Gurw. 141. x. 435, Tor. v. 261, 262.

Primer No words can do justice to the exquisite beauty of the scenery through which the British troops, especially those on the left wing, passed during this memorable march. The romanic valleys of the mountain region whence the Elgo draws its woters, which at every season excite the admiration of the passing traveller, were at that time singularly enhanced by the exquisite verdure of the opening spring.

the pomp of military music, as the troops wended their way through the valleys, blended with the shepherd's pipe on the bills above, while the numerous columns of horse, fool, and cannon, winding in every direction through the defiles, gave an inexpressible variety and claim to the buildscape. Even the common soldiers were not insensible to the beauty of the speciacle thus perpetually placed before their eyes. Often the men rested on their muskets with their arms crossed, gazing on the lovely scenes which lay spread far beneath their feet; and more than once the heads of the columns involuntarily halted to satiate their eyes with a spectacle of beauty; the like of which all felt they might never see again (1).

The immense baggage trains of Joseph's army had now fallen back into the basin of Vittoria; and seventy thousand men were asaimy and sembled to protect their retreat into France. But it seemed hardly possible that even that large force could secure the safe transit of such an enormous multitude of carriages; and yet how could they be abandoned without confessing defeat, and relinquishing at the same time the whole ammunition waggons and military stores of the army? The rapacity of the French authorities in Spain; the general spoliation which, from the marshals downwards, they had exercised under the imperial orders in every part of the country, now fell with just but terrible force upon them; their gallant army was about to be overwhelmed by the immensity of its spoil. In retreating through Madrid and the two Castiles, the French authorities had levied contributions surpassing all the former ones in severity and magnitude; and the enormous sums raised in this way, amounting to five millions and a half of dollars, were all existing in hard cash, and constituted no inconsiderable part of the weight with which the army was encumbered. Not content with these pecuniary exactions, both Joseph and his generals had faithfully followed the example set them by the Emperor, in collecting and bringing off all the most precious works of art which adorned the Spanish capital and provinces. All the marshals, from Murat, who commenced the pillage in 1808, had gratified themselves by seizing upon the finest paintings which were to be found in convents or private palaces in every part of the country; and Marshal Soult in particular, had, from the rich spoils of the Andalusian convents, formed the noble collection of paintings by Murillo and Velasquez, which now adorns his hotel at Paris. But when Joseph and his whole civil functionaries came to break up finally from Madrid, the work of spoliation went on on a greater scale, and extended to every object of interest, whether from beauty, rarity, or antiquity, which was to be found in the royal palaces or museums. Many of the finest works of Titian, Raphael, and Correggio, were got hold of in this manner, especially from the Escurial and the royal palace at Madrid; while all the archives and museums in the capital and in Old Castile, had been compelled to yield up their most precious contents to accompany the footsteps of the fugitive monarch. All this precious spoil was dragged along in endless convoy in the rear of the French army; and when it halted and faced about in the basin of Vittoria, it was rather from a sense of the evident impossibility of transporting the prodigious mass in safety through the approaching defiles of the Pyrenecs, than from any well-founded hope of being able to resist the shock of the Anglo-Portuguese army (2).

The basin of Vittoria, which has become immortal from the battle, of the basin of Vittoria, which has become immortal from the battle, decisive of the fate of the Peninsula, which was fought within its bosom, is a small plain, about eight miles in length by six in breadth, situated in an elevated plateau among the mountains. It is bounded on the north and east by the commencement of the Pyrencean range, and on the west by a chain of rugged mountains, which separates the province of Alava from that of Biscay. A traveller entering the valley from the side of Miranda del Ebro, by the great road from Madrid, emerges into the plain by the pass of Puchla, where the 7adorra forces its way through a nairow cleft in the mountain, in its descent to the Ebro, and from whence the sures of Vittoria, situated at the extremity of the plain, are visible about eight miles distint. This little plain is intersected by two ranges of hills, which cross it nearly from east to west, and afforded two very stroog positions, where the French army endeavoured to stop the advance of the Allies, the first being on either side of Armez, and the second, which was a much stronger ground, was around Comecha Several roads from the mountains on all sides intersect each other at Vittoria, particularly those to Pampeluna, Bilbon, and Gallicla, but although they are all practicable for guns, yet that which leads direct to St -Sebastian and Bayonne, through Gamarra Mayor, was alone adequate to receive the vast trains of carriages which were heaped up in and around that town Iwo great convoys had already departed by this road, and were now far advanced on the way to France, but a still greater quantity, including the whole royal treasure, and all the gins and ammuni-2 . 1 st another t was of the highest importance hands of the

⁽¹⁾ Recollections of the Peninsula. 173, 176, and (2) Tor, v. 262, 272. personal knowledge.

... .

. enemy, while the bulk of the army on the broken ground, in the middle of the plain of Vittoria, codeavoured to arrest the advance of the ailied force (1)

The departure of the two heavy laden convoys for France, sens the armier bly duminished the strength of Joseph's army, for they required to restre a des be guarded by strong escorts to prevent them falling into the hands of the Biscay guerillas The guard attending the last, consisted of no less than three thousand troops under General Maucune After this large reduction, however, the French army amounted to above seventy thousand men, of whom sixty-five thousand were effective combatants, and they had one de Pomar, and some stragglers had necessarily fatten bettind unit a and fatiguing a march as that which they had made from the Portuguese frontier But in addition to this force, there were fully eighteen thousand Spannards, so that the total force was above eighty thousand, with ninety guns. The strength of the French position consisted chiefly in the great number of bridges which the allied forces had to pass, over the numerous mountain streams which descend into the basin of Vittoria, some of which particularly that of Puebla and Nanclares, to the south of Vittoria, and that of Gamarra Mayor and Ariega, to the north of that town, were of great strength, and easily susceptible of defence. The ridges too, which cross the plain, afforded successive defensive positions, the last of which was close to the town of Vittoria On the other hand, the weakness of their slimition consisted in the single line of retreat passable for the carriages of the army, which was kept open for them in case of disaster, and the appalling dangers which awaited them if their arms in the plan met with a serious reserse, and either lost the command of the great road to Bayonne, or was driven, with its immense files of ainmunition and bazzage-waggons, into the rough mountain road leading to Pampeluna (2)

Having anxiously surveyed the enemy's position on the afternoon of the 20th, and perceiving that they steed firm, and were making preparations for battle, Wellington, on his side, made his dispositions for an attack. Hill, with twenty thousand men, was to move with the right wing, at daybreak, into the great road to Vittoria, in the neighbourhood of Puebla, and advancing through the defile, which was not occupied in strength by the enemy, expand his force as he arrived in the open plain; Murillo, with his division of Spaniards, keeping on his right, on the heights between the great road and the hills. The right centre, under Wellington in person, consisting of the light and fourth divisions, with Ponsonby's cavalry and the dragoon guards, were to proceed through the pass which leads to Subijana-de-Morillos, and, crossing the ridges which formed the southern boundary of the basin of Vittoria, move straight forward to their respective points of attack on the Zadorra, especially the bridges of Mendoza, Tres Puentes, and Nanclares. The left centre, comprising the third and seventh divisions, was to move by the village of Gueta, direct upon the steeples of Vittoria; Sir Thomas Graham moving from Murguia on the left, with the first and fifth divisions, Longa's Spaniards, and Anson and Bock's cavalry, in all about twenty thonsand men, by the Bilboa road, so as to fall on the extreme French right ander Reille, and if possible force the bridge of the Zadorra at Gamarra Mayor, and thus intercept the line of retreat for the army by the great road to Bayonne (1). The effect of these dispositions, if simultaneously and successfully carried into execution, obviously would be to cut off the retreat of the French army by the only line practicable for their numerous carriages, at the very time that they were hard pressed by the main body of the Allies in front, and thus expose them to total ruin (2).

(1) Morning State of the Ando-Portuguese Army, 21st June, 1813.

			Persont.		T n	Total,
		Under A	1ms. 00	Comm	and, Present.	On Command.
Britisle Cavalry,	• • •	. 1	,791 ,152	55° 223		1,076
British Infantry,			,648 ,905	1,771	ļ	,,,,,
· Total Infantry, .					- 47,563	2.800
Sabres and bayanets, Deduct the 6th Division left					56,806	3,806
de Pourre,		•			6,320	****
Total Sabres and Dayon	rts,,,				50,486	3,685
	Spanis	k Auxile	aries.
Infantry :	•
Marillo's Divisio Giron's Division Carlos d'Uspago: Longa's Division Cavalry : Renne Villemor, Julian Sincley,	, alioid a's Divísi i, about about .	ou, abon			Mcn. 3,000 12,000 3,000 3,000 1,000
	Total Sp: Total, Ar				· 23,000 · 50,186
		Grand to Camon,			73,486	•

⁻NAPITE'S Peninsular War, vol. v., p. 622.

had an opportunity of referring to the late admirable publication of Wyld's Plans of the Peninsular Camp eigns, accompanied by the valuable explanatory Memoir, which is enriched with so many of

.本

⁽²⁾ Murray's Instructions in Wyld's Memoirs, 100, 102. Nap. v. 554, 555. Wellington to Lord Bathurst, 22d June 1813. Grew. x. 446.

This is the first occasion in which the author has

The French order of battle, hastily taken up, without any master beautiful and threet it, was much less ably conceived, and bore the baute mark rather of the hurried defensive arrangement of several independent corps suddenly and unexpectedly assailed by superior forces, than the dehberate arrangement of a great army about to contend with a worthy antagonist for the dominon of the Peninsula. The right, which was opposed to Graham, occupied the heights in front of the Zadorra, above the village of Abecliuco, and covered Vittoria from approach by the Bibbar aroat; the centre extended along the left bank of the same river, commanding and blocking up the great road fro which Sir Rowland Hill was Clausel, was stationed at Logrono, to secure the road to Pampelium, on which it was already feared the army would mainly have to depend for its retreat; and Foy had been stationed in the tect them from the incursions of keep open flie communications of the ar.

ments weakened the disposable force of the French, on which rehance could be ninced for the shock of battle, by more than twenty thousand men; so that the shock of battle, by more than twenty thousand men; so that the shock of battle, by more than twenty thousand men; so that the shock of battle, by more than twenty thousand men; so that ind they had a hundred and fifty pieces of cannot the new source. Another, if worsted, was in the highest degree perilors, for the mountain read to Pampelina was impracticable for the multitude of carriages which througed the plain; and it was easy to see, that if the centre of the army, which covered the great road from Madrid, was forced, its whole artiflery and equipage would be lost (4).

At daybreak, on the morning of the 21st, the whole British cotitor.

Items were in motion, and the centre and right soon surmounted and 3 marks tunion a kept the field; fresh troops remotice uncar ghts, or that Bill was obliged to send the 71st, and Walker's breade to Murillo's support, the support when that no.

ing eyes the

Sir George Murray's original orders and sustrict Lots white quartermaster general of the army He has sorrer travelled in again, and therefore cannot country (1) bect et Conq 251 217 217 217 218 10 315

advance of his heroic Highlanders along the ridge. Still the battle was maintained with extraordinary resolution on the summit, and it was only by sending fresh troops to their support, and step by step, by force of sheer fighting, that the French were at length borne backwards to nearly opposite Subijana; while Hill, in the valley below, encouraged by the progress of the scarlet uniforms on the summit on his right, pressed vigorously forward, and emerging from the defile of Puebla, earried by storm the village of Subijana, and extended his line into communication with his extreme right on the summit of the ridge (1).

While this bloody conflict was going on on the steeps above the Za-Wellington dorra on the right, Wellington himself, with the centre, had surmounted the heights in his front, and descended in great strength centic. into the plain of Vittoria. His troops met with no serious opposition till they came to the bridges by which the rivers in the bottom were crossed; but as they were all occupied by the enemy, and the rocky thickets on their sides filled with tirailleurs, a warm exchange of musketry began, especially at the bridge of Nanclares, opposite the fourth division, and that of Villodar, by which the light divisions were to cross. The attack on these bridges was delayed till the third and seventh divisions, who formed the reserves of the centre, had come up to their ground, and they were somewhat retarded by the roughness of the hills over which they had to march; and meanwhile Wellington sent orders to Hill to arrest the progress of his extreme right on the summit of the ridge, in order that the whole army might advance abreast. Meanwhile, a Spanish peasant brought information that the bridge of Tres Puentes was negligently gnarded, and offered himself to guide the light division over it; and the heads of the columns of the third and seventh divisions, forming the left centre, having now appeared on their ground, the advance was resumed at all points, both in the centre and on the right. Kempt's brigade of the light division, led by the brave peasant, soon gained the bridge; the fifteenth linssars, coming up at a canter, dashed by single file over, and the arch was won. It was now one o'clock; the firing was renewed with redoubled vigour on the heights above Subijana, while faint columns of white smoke, accompanied by a sound like distant thunder, showed that Graham's attack on Gamarra Mayor, in the enemy's rear, had commenced. At this moment the third and seventh divisions were moving rapidly down to the bridge of Mendoza; but the enemy's light troops and guns kept up a most vigorous fire upon the advancing masses, until the riflemen of the light division, who had got across at Tres Puentes, charged them in flank, when the position was abandoned, and the British left crossed without further opposition. The whole French centre, alarmed by the progress which Graham was making in their rear, now retreated towards Vittoria, not, however, in disorder, but facing about at every defensible position to retard the enemy; while the British troops continued to advance in pursuit in admirable order, their regiments and squadrons surmounting the rugged inequalities in the ground with the most beautiful precision (2).

Decisive Success of Graham on the left. That noble officer, who, at the age of sixty-the left eight, possessed all the vigour of twenty-five, and who was gifted with the true eye of a general, had started before daylight from his bivouac in the mountains on the left, and by eleven o'clock, after a most fatiguing and ⁽¹⁾ Nap. v. 554, 555. Vict. et Conq. 242, 243. Wellington to Lord Bathurst, June 22, 1813. Gurw. x. 417. Gazan's Official Account, Wyld's Mem. 101.

⁽²⁾ Wellington to Lord Bathurst, June 22, 1813. Gurw. x. 448. Gazan's Official Account. Wyld, 102. Vict. ct Conq. xxii. 213. Nap. v. 557, 559.

toilsome march over the bills, reached the heights above Gamarra Mayor and menced the attack, and not only drove the enemy from the heights, but got possession of Gamarra Menor, which cut off the read to Durango Gamarra Mayor was the next object of attack, and the French, aware of its importance, as commanding the great road to Bayonne, made the most strenuous efforts for its defence At length Robinson's brigade of the fifth division burst in, bearing down all opposition, and capturing three guns; but Beille's men had harricaded the opposite end of the bridge, and their fire from the windows of the houses was so severe that they retained the opposite bank of the Zadorra At the same time the Germans under Halket had, in the most gallant manner, assaulted the village of Abechuco, which commanded the bridge of Ariega. It was at length carried by the brave Germans and Bradford's Portuguese; but they were unable, any more than at Gamarra Mayor. to force the bridge, and a murderous fire of musketry was kept up from the opposite sides, without enabling either party to dislodge the other from its position. But meanwhile General Sarrut was killed, and some British brigades pushing on, got possession of the great road from Vittoria to Bayonne, and immediately the ery spread through the French army, that their retreat was cut off and oll was lost (1).

hereat of the French to Vittoria the French soldiers mainta and steadiness which had rendered rope. A large hody of skirmishers was thrown out to check the advance of the pursuing columns; and fifty guns, placed in the rear, which were worked with extraordinary vigour, retarded for some time the pursuit of the British centre. Wellington, however, brought up several British batteries, and the enemy were at length forced back to the ridge in front of Gomecha. An obstinate conflict took place in Arrier, into which Picton plunged at the head of the riflemen of his division; but at leogth the village was carried; the 87th, under Colonel Gongh, stormed Hermandad; and the I rench in Subijana, finding their right forced back, were obliged to retreat two miles towards Vittoria in a disordered mass. Thus the action became a sort of running fight or cannonade, which continued for six miles, but the I rench, unable to hold uny position long r to draw off; and as they were all. Vittoria, the throng there became excessive, and already the crues of despare, as on the banks of the Berezina, be conducted by the only road which remained open, that to l'ampelina; but it was too late to draw off any of the carriages; and "as the I nglid shot went booming overhead," says an oye-whites," the vast crowd started and swerved with a convulsive movement, while a dull and hornd sound of directs arose, but there was no hope, no stay for either army or multitude (2)" Eighty pieces of cannon, jammed close together near Vittoria, kept up a desperate fire to the last, and the gamners worked them with frantic coergy; while Reille, with heroic resolution, maintained by ground on the Upper Zadorra; but it was all of no avail; the great road to France was lost;

an overturned waggon on that to Pampeluna, rendered all further passage for carriages impracticable; the British dragoons were thundering in close pursuit; and soon the frantic multitude dispersed on all sides, making their way through fields, across ditches, and over the hills, leaving their whole artillery, ammunition-waggons, and the spoil of a kingdom, as a prey to the victors (1).

Never before, in modern times, had such a prodigious accumulathe battle, tion of military stores and private wealth fallen to the lot of a victorious army. Jourdan's marshal's baton, Joseph's private carriage, a hundred and lifty-one brass guns, four hundred and lifteen eaissons of ammunition, thirteen hundred thousand ball-eartridges, fourteen thousand rounds of ammunition, and forty thousand pounds of gunpowder, constituted the military trophies of a victory, where six thousand also were killed and wounded, and a thousand prisoners taken. It at one blow destroyed the warlike efficiency of the French army, swept them like a whirlwind from the Spanish plains, and made Joseph's grown drop from his head. No estimate ean be formed of the amount of private plunder which was taken on the field, but it exceeded any thing witnessed in modern war; for it was not the produce of the sack of a city or the devastation of a province, but the accumulated plunder of a kingdom during five years, which was now at one fell swoop reft from the spoiler. Independent of private booty, no less than five millions and a half of dollars in the military chest of the army were taken; and of private wealth, the amount was so prodigious, that for miles together the combatants may be almost said to have marched upon gold and silver without stooping to pick it up. But the regiments which followed, not equally warmed in the fight, were not so disinterested: enormous spoil fell into the hands of the private soldiers; and the cloud of eamp-followers and sutlers who followed in their train swept the ground so completely, that only a hundred thousand dollars of the whole taken was brought into the military chest! But the effects of this prodigious booty speedily appeared in the dissolution of the bonds of discipline in a large part of the army: the frightful national vice of intemperanee broke out in dreadful colours, from the unbounded means of indulging it which were thus-speedily acquired; and we have the authority of Wellington for the assertion, that three weeks after the battle, above twelve thousand soldiers had disappeared from their colours, though the total loss of the battle was only 5180, of whom 5508 were British; and these stragglers were only reclaimed by sedulous efforts and rigorous severity (2).

So vast was the number of ladies of pleasure who were among the booty taken earriages in the train of the French officers, that it was a common saying afterwards in their army, that it was no wonder they were beaten at

⁽¹⁾ Nap. v. 561, 562. Viet. et Conq. axii. 249. Jom. iv. Wellington to Lnrd Bathurst, 22d June 1813. Guru. x. 449, 450.

⁽²⁾ Wellington to Lord Bathurst, June 22, 1813.
Gurw x, 452, 453; and July 9, 1813 fbid. 519; and June 29, 1813, 472. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 252.

We started with the army in the highest order, and up to the day of the battle nothing could get on better; but that event has, is usual, totally annihilated all order and discipline. The soldiers of the army bave gnt among them about a million sterling in money, with the exception of about 100,000 dollars which were got in the military chest. The night of the battle, instead of being passed in getting rest and food, to prepare them for the pursuit of the following day, was passed by the soldiers in looking for plunder. The consequence was, that they were incapable of marching in pursuit of the enemy, and were totally knocked up. The rain came on, and increased our fatigues; and I am ennvinced that we have now out of our ranks double the amount of our loss in the battle, and have lost more men in the pursuit than the enemy have, though we have never in one day made unre than an ordinary march."-WELLINGTON to LORD BATHURST, 29th June 1813. GURWOOD, x. 473.

[&]quot;By the State of yesterday we had 12,500 men less under arms, than we had on the day before the less under arms, than we had on the day defore the battle. They are not in the hospital, nor are they killed, nor have they fallen into the hands of the enemy as prisoners: I have had officers in all directions after them, but have not heard of any of them. I believe they are concealed in the villages in the mountains."—Williagron to Load Barnupst, 9th July 1813. Gurnood, x. 519. The loss in the battle was just 5,000; so that 7,500 had straggled from the effects of the plunder.

Vittoria, for they cacrificed their guns to save their mistresses. Rich vestures of all soris, velvet and silk brocades, gold and silver plate, noble pictures, jewels, laces, cases of claret and champagne, poodles, parrots, monkeys, and frinkets, lay scattered about the field in endless confusion, amidst neeping mothers, wailing infants, and all the unutterable miseries of warlike overthrow Joseph himself narrowly escaped being made prisoner a squadron of dragoons pursued the carriage and fired into it, and he had barely time to throw himself out and e-cape on horseback under shelter of a squadron of horse, his carriage was taken, and in it the beautiful Coreggio of Christ in the Garden, which now adorus Apsley House in London The great convoy of pictures, honeier, which Joseph was carrying off, after narrowly escaping recapture, reached France in safety, having set out a day previously. The bonds contracted during so many years' occupation of the Peninsula, many of them of the tenderest kind, were all at once snapped asunder by one rude shock, and amidst the shouts of joy which arose on all sides for a delivered monarchy, were heard the sighs of the vanquished, who mourned the severance of the closest ties by world Wellington, in a worthy to the many ladies of rank and Countess Gazan, with a number of other wives of the French officers, were next day sent on to Pampeluna with a flag of truce, in their own carriages, which had been rescued from the spoil. But a more important acquisition was obtained in the whole archives of the court of Madrid, including a great mass of Aapolton's original and secret correspondence, an invaluable acquisition to lustoric truth, to which this narrative has been more than once largely indebted. It is a remarkable fact that the battle was fought in the close vier nity of the spot where the gallant attempt of the Black Prince to establish tho rightful though savage monarch, Peter the Crucl, on the throne of Spain, five hundred vears before, had been victorious, and when pursuing the French troops near Yince, over the hall which stall bears the name of the "English hill," (Inglessmends,) the English soldners unconsciously trode on the bones of their fathers. Twice had the fate of Spain been decided, by the add of British blood, in the plan of Vitoria (1)

The battle of Victoria resounded like a thunderelan in every part and valences of Spain. Madrid was finally evacuated on the 27th, and the whole French authorities and partizans of the dethroned monarch, aban the of the doning every part of Old and New Castile, made all imaginal le haste to cross the Ebro Suchet, who, notwithstanding his defeat at Castalla and the subsequent operations of Sir John Murray, of which an account will immediately le given, still retained his retrenched to mon on the Jucar, was compelled, with a heavy heart, to abandon the beautiful kingdom of Valencia, and all his magnificent establishments there, in which he had ruled for eighteen months with the authority and state of a sovereign, and, Icasing garrisons only in Saguntum and Pem cola, reured with all his army aeross the Ebro, where he distributed his forces between Taragona and Tortosa Tho immediately moved forward and cccupied Valencia. The total exacuation of all Spain south of the I bro by the French troops, necessarily rendered defenceless that very consideral le portion, especially of the higher classes, in its central provinces, who lat adhered to the fortunes of the French dynasty, and were known in the Pennsula by the contemptuous name of paramentados, and there was every reason to fear that the Cortes, having them now in their power, would hasten to gratify alike their long-cherished indignation, and present appetite for gain, by condemning a large portion of them to the scaffold, and confiscating their estates. To guard against this danger, Wellington, amidst his martial toils, addressed to the Cortes a long and able memoir, enforcing the propriety of granting, with a few exceptions, a general amnesty to those of the opposite party, and supporting it by a detail of the various circumstances which had so long rendered the contest to all appearance hopeless, and thereby extenuated, if they could not altogether excuse, their adherence to the intrusive monarch. The principles contained in this memoir, discriminating, humane, and politic, will not, by future ages, be deemed the least honourable monument to the fame of Wellington; and they came with singular grace from a victorious general in the very moment of his highest triumph—when he had rescued the country from the foreign yoke whose partizans he was thus shielding from the natural indignation of their countrymen (1).

Imminent On the day of the battle, Clauser with his division, so and to Vittoria, arnarrow sand strong, quitted Logrono, and, taking the road to Vittoria, arrived at the gates of that town late at night, after the conflict was over, and when it had fallen into the hands of the British. Fearful of being cut off, he immediately retired, and, marching all night, fell back towards Saragossa, but halted at Logrono to receive intelligence, where he remained till the evening of the 25th. This long delay had wellnigh proved fatal to him, and undoubtedly would have done so, if the march of the British, immediately after the battle, had not been retarded by the heavy rains which fell for two days, and the relaxation of discipline occasioned by the prodigious spoil they had taken. No sooner was Wellington informed of Clausel's position than he marched in person, with eighteen thousand men, by Tafalla upon Logrono, while twelve thousand were directed upon that town from the side of Salvatierra, and Mina followed on the enemy's rear. The French general was made aware of his danger just in time to escape being surrounded; and setting out with all imaginable expedition, he retreated by Calahorra and

(1) Wellington to Don Juan O'Donoju, June 11th,

1813. Gurw. x. 431. Tor. v. 298.
"I am the last person who will be found to diminish the merit of the Spaniards who have adhered to the cause of the country during the severe trial which I hope has passed, particularly of those who, having remained among the enemy without entering their service, have served their country at the risk of their lives. But at the same time that I can appreciate the merit of those individuals, and of the nation at large, I can forgive the weakness of those who have been induced by terror, by distress, or by despair, to pursue a different line of conduct.

"I entreat the government to advert to the circumstances of the commencement, and of the different stages of this eventful contest; and to the numerous occasions in which all men must have imagined that it was impossible for the powers of the Peninsula, although aided by Great Britain, to withstand the colossal power by which they were assailed, and nearly overcome. Let them reflect upon the weakness of the country at the commencement of the contest, upon the numerous and almost invariable disasters of the armies, and upon the ruinous disorganization which followed; and let them decide whether those who were witnesses of these events are guilty, because they could not foresee what has since occurred. The majority are certainly not guilty in any other manner; and many, as I have above stated, now deemed guilty in the eye of the law, as having served the pretended king, have, hy that very act, acquired the means of serving, and have rendered important services to their country.

"It is toy opinion that the policy of Spain should lead the government and the Cortes to grant a general annuesty, with certain exceptions. This subject deserves consideration in the two views of the cf. the country in which his armies will be stationed, He will see clearly that he can place no reliance on any partizans in Spain; and he will not have even a pretence for supposing that country is divided in opininn. If the effort should succeed, as I sincerely hope it may, the object of the government should be to pacify the country, and to heal the divisions which the contest unavoidably must have occasioned. It is impossible that this object can be accomplished as long as there exists a large body of the Spanish nation, some possessing the largest properties in the country, and others endowed with considerable talents, who are proscribed for their conduct during the contest; conduct which has been caused by the misfortunes to which I have above adverted."—Wellington to Don Juan O'Dono-Ju, Spanish Minister at War. Gurwood, vol. x. p. 431, 432.

Tuleda upon Saragossa, where he arrived on the 1st July, making a forced march of sixty miles in forty hours. Thence he retreated by Jaca, and through the passes of the Pyrenees into France, closely followed by Mina, who managed the other ways with subtractions of the Pyrenes into France, closely followed by Mina, who managed the other ways with subtractions of the Pyrenes in the Pyrenes of the Pyrenes in the Pyrenes in the Pyrenes of the Pyrenes in the Pyrenes of th of Bastan into France, in the deepest dejection, with only one gun in their largest whole array, hardly any ammonition, and no baggage, inhitary closest, or papers of any description, insomuch that the whole muster-rolls and pay-sheets of the army were lost, and their organization, as a military force, was at an end. The blockade of Pampeluna was immediately formed by the English general, into which a garrison of six thousand men had been thrown by the retreating army. Meanwhile Graham, with the left wing, moved against Foy, who, with his division, was in the neighbourhood of Durango during the battle, and who immediately after set about collecting the small garrisons in Lower Biscay, with a view to a general retreat to St.-Schsstan.

Operations While Clausel was making this narrow escape from the right wing Flampshas of the allied forces, the centre, under thill, pursued the main body circles of the routed army, which retired by Pampeluna and up the valley of Bastan into France, in the deepest dejection, with only one gun in their labels.

Jane 23 He arrived in Tolosa with twelve thousand men almost at the same time with Sir Thomas Graham; but having succeeded in making his entrance first, be barricadoed the streets, and maintained himself there, with the aid of a fortifi of a fortifi .

trance na and theer . :
loss, hone

whither he followed a few days afterwards, and bifor had the teleptor chaining the last French in that quarter from the Spanish territory. At the same time, the forts of Passages, with their garrison of a hundred and fifty men, were surrendered to Longa; Castro-Urdhales was evacuated, the garrison taking refuge in Santona, and the Conde d'Abisbal, who had come up with the army of reserve from Andalusia, cartied by storm the forts of Pancorvo, garrisoned by seven hundred men, which commanded the great road in the rear between Burgos and Vittoria (2).

Nothing remained to complete the entire expulsion of the Feench from the north-western provinces of Spain, but to root them out from the fortified strongholds of Santona, Pampeluna, and St.-Sersylla, which were the only fortresses in that quarter which they still field in the Pennsula. Pampeluna was already closely invested by Ibil; and Graham lost no time in investing he latter fortress, which has acquired such celebrity from the dreadful assaults of which it shortly after became the object. Before, however, the firstish outposts could reach the town, Foy had succeeded in throwing in considerable reinforcements; and the garrison, swelled by detachments that took refuge there by sea, from Guetarra and other fortified posts on the coast which were abandoned, amounted to three thousand men, and was under the command of Finmanuel Rey, one of those rare characters whose resolution and constancy, unshaken amudst misfortune, are fitted to arrest or stay the fall of empires-St-Sebastian is situated upon the extremity of a low sandy pennisula,

⁽¹⁾ Nop v 511, 572 Vict. et Cong xais, 252 Cong xxis, 2.2 Welliogton to Lord Balbarit, 23 for v 288 2.00 July 1862 Gars, s 501.

⁽²⁾ Tor, v 231, 283 Asp. v. 569, 57f Vecl et of St.-Sc. which forms its harbone while on the other side it is which forms its harhour, while on the other side it is bounded by the opening into which the Urumea stream empties its waters. Immediately behind the town, at the extremity of the enrved peninsula, stands a conical hill four hundred feet high, the craggy base of which is washed by the ocean. while its summit is crowned with the old castle of La Mota. The southern face of this hill, which overlooks the town, is separated from it by a range of defensive works covered with batteries; so that the mountain called Moute. Orgallo could hold ont after the town was taken. The land front of St. Sebastian, stretching across the isthmus, is three hundred and fifty vards broad. and consists of a lofty solid curtain of masonry, with a flat bastion in the centre, covered by a hornwork, having the usual countersearn, covered way, and glacis. But the flank defences, running along the peniusula and facing the Urumea, consist merely of a simple rampart wall, ill flanked, without either ditch, counterscarp, outwork, or external obstacle of any kind; and this wall, such as it is, is exposed, from its summit to its base, to a fire from the Chofre range of sandhills on the right of the Urumea, at the distance of from five hundred to a thousand yards. It could not be said, therefore, to be a strong place, and in fact it had no pretensions to more than a third-rate fortress; and in addition to this, at the time of the battle of Vittoria, it was nearly dismantled, as many of the guns had been removed to form battering trains, or arm smaller fortified posts on the coast: there were no bomb-proof casements nor palisades, the wells were in bad order, and the place was snpplied with water by a single aqueduct, which was cut off the moment the investment was formed. The Urumea is fordable for two hours before and after high water, so that troops during that period can approach by the dry sands the foot of the sea scarp wall of the town. Aware of this circumstance, Marshal Berwick, when he besieged St.-Schastian in the last century, threw up batteries on the Chofre sandhills, to breach the eastern face of the town's seawall, while approaches were pushed along the isthmus, to prevent the approach to the breach being impeded; and it was on the footsteps of that accomplished commander that the British engineers now prepared to tread (1). Commence-ment of the The population of St.-Sebastian, which usually does not exceed eight thousand souls, had been more than doubled by the influx siege by Sir T. of Spanish families, most of them composed of persons of consideration and station, who had taken office under Joseph's governsive meri-sures of the ment, and fled there, after the wreck of Vittoria, as the only stronghold which still held out for the intrusive monarch in the northern provinces. The governor being made aware at the same time by General Foy, that he was about to retire into France, and that St.-Schastian must look to its own resources, was grievously oppressed by this load of useless mouths. who yet were of such a station that he could neither render them serviceable nor treat them with severity; and he used all his influence, therefore, to get them to depart for France, which by land and sea was immediately accomplished. Delivered of this extraneous load, it was the first care of the French governor to occupy the convent of St.-Bartholomew, which is situated at the end of the isthmus, opposite to the land face of the fortress, in order to destroy all the buildings in it which might furnish a shelter to the besiegers. Fortifications were commenced at that point, in order to render it an outwork that might retard the enemy; the wooden bridge over the Urumea, which connected the town with its eastern shore, was hurned; several houses in the suburbs destroyed, to make room for the firing place; the wells eleared out; palisades hastily run up in front of the outworks; and every preparation made for a vigorous defence; while all "

But the B with a be-were reputsed in an attack on the convent of St.-Bartholomew. advances were made against it in form. Meanwhile the garrison were reinforced by troops from Guetaria, who arrived by sea during the night; and they succeeded in mounting seventy-six heavy guns upon the ramparts, the greater part of which were on the face fronting the peninsula. The approaches however, against the convent of St -Bartholomew were vigorously carried on , and Wellington, having visited the works, gave his sanction to the advice of Major Smith, the chief of the engineers before Sir B. I letcher armed, that

The breaching batteries against the content of St -Bartholomew of ht Bur were begun on the night of the 10th; and on the night of the 15th twenty guns of heavy calibre opened their fire. On the forenoon of the 17th, the convent, being nearly laid in ruins, was assaulted by a nart of the 9th British and three companies of the Royals, under the command of Golonel Cameron, and detachments of the Portuguese. The assault of this isolated and clevated stronghold presented an animating spectacle, for it lay exposed to the guns both of the besiegers and of the fortress, and between the two sides sixty pieces of heavy cannon directed their fire upon the assailants or the convent, during the time the assault was going on After a gallant resistance, however, the place was carried, and loud cheers from the British troops who watched the contest from the opposite shore, But the assailants, carried away by their ardonr, pursued the fugitives into the fortress, and thus sustaining some loss from the fire of the ramparts, were glad to seek shelter among the rushed walls of the consent. No sooner was this advanced post gained than the British established batteries on the height where the conjent was placed, to annoy the enemy by a fire from that side; and meanwhile the main batteries were erected on the Choire sandbills on the

on the Monte Oha sent its plunging shot across the Urnmea, a distance of 4500 yards, with great effect upon the same point. The effect of the concentrated fire of these batteries was soon very apparent; a considerable part of the wall came down with a tremendous crash, and the besieged, who were now obliged to husband their ammonition, were seen to be indefatigable in their efforts to intrench the place inside the breach, and render the counterscarp after it was carried incapable of descent. At ten o'clock on the 21st, a fing of truce to surrender was held out, but the governor refused to receive it. The fire was consequently resumed, and with such extraordipary vigour, that the ten heavy pieces on the newest Choice sandhills, discharged three hundred and fifty rounds in lifteen and a half hours July 22 of daylight, being at the rate of about twenty-five discharges an hour, or one in every two minutes and a quarter-a rapidity of fire, to be sustained for so long a time, which is perhaps unexampled in artillery practice. The flanking batteries on the convent of St.-Bartholomew and in front of the Monte Olia, were also very destructive, and on the 25d a mortar battery and two sixty-eight pound carronades were turned upon the defences of the great breach, with such effect that the whole parapets near it were speedily destroyed, and the adjoining houses in the inside took fire and burned with extraordinary fierceness. The breach being now plainly practicable, the assault was ordered for the morning of the 24th; but so frightful was the conflagration at daybreak, that it seemed impossible for the assailants to penetrate into the town in that quarter, and therefore it was deferred till night, when the fall of the tide might again render the Urnmea fordable, and it was hoped the fire would be abated by the houses being consumed. During the whole of the 24th, the besiegers' batteries kept up an incessant fire on the breach, as well with bombs and cannon-shot, as with shrapnell shells, then for the first time used in war, which did very great mischief to the besieged; but they, on their side, were not idle, and turned to the best account the breathing time thus afforded for making preparations against the assault. Live shells were placed along the top of the rampart, ready to be rolled down on the English troops as they threaded their way from the bridge. The houses behind the hurning edifices were loopholed, and filled with troops; and heavy gims, loaded with grape-shot, placed on either side of the bridge, to cut down the assailants if they won the summit of the flaming rains (1).

Unsuccess- No sooner was it dark on the 24th than the storming commun, control assault on the place, sisting of two thousand men, under Major Fraser, Colonel Greville, and Colonel Cameron, silently defiled out of the trenches, and advanced with a swift pace over the intervening ground lying between them and the river. The ground, however, as it was dark, proved extremely difficult to pass over; it was strewed with rocks, covered with slippery sea-weed, which much impeded the march of the column; the water, when they reached the Urnmea, was up to the soldiers' arm-pits, and when they got to the opposite side, they had to pass, for a considerable distance, immediately under the foot of the rampart, to the left of the breach, exposed to all the flaming projectiles which could be rolled down upon them from its summit. The column, however, advanced with great resolution, and got through the water unperceived by the enemy; and before they reached the foot of the rampart on the opposite side, a globe of compression, which had been run into an old drain near the counterscarp and glacis of the hornwork which flanked the breach, exploded with tremendons violence, and shook all that part of the defences. The garrison, astonished at this event, abandoned the flanking outwork; and the advancing column, though severely galled by the firing flank of the British batteries on the other side of the Urumea, which, by firing too low, struck their own men, succeeded in reaching the foot of the breach without any very scrious loss from the enemy. Major Fraser of the Royal Scotch, and Lieutenant Jones of the engineers, were the first to mount the breach, followed by a few brave men; and if the remainder of the column had come up in quick succession, as was expected, the place would have been taken in a quarter of an hour; for the enemy, thunderstruck at the rapidity of the advance, had retreated behind the ruins of the burning houses, and the pass might at that moment have been easily won. But the troops, who came straggling up irregularly and in small bodies, as they made their way over the rocks and through the water, did not support the gallant party in advance so quickly as was expected; and meanwhile the enemy, recovering from their consternation, opened a tremendous fire from all sides, as well upon the troops who had mounted the breach as those who were struggling at its foot, and wending their dillicuit way between the rising flood and the rampart. The heroic Fraser was killed aim the flaming rulins into which he had penetrated; Jones stood, with a few brate soldiers, alone for some time on the breach, expecting aid, but noue came up; and before the arrival of the scaling ladders to escalado the ramparts, they were almost all killed or wounded Colonel Greville and Colonel Cameron exerted themselves to the utmost to lead the troops up the breach, and Lientenant Campbell of the 9th twice mounted it, almost alone, and was twice.

⁽¹⁾ Jones' Sieges, ii. 28, 37, Belm. iv. 618, 623. Nap. vi. 75, 79.

sustaining a loss of five hundred and twenty men, including the gillant Sir Richard Fletcher, who was severely wounded. The rising tide threatened to drown all the wounded who lay between the flood and the ramport, in consequence of which a flag of truce was displayed by the British for an hour, at daylight, to enable the enemy to rescue the wounded from their persions situation; and, with admirable humanity, the French answered the oppeal, and brought the whole of the maimed safe over the breach into the hospitals, where they were placed boyde their own wounded men, and tended with equal circle during the remainder of the sign (1).

As soon as Wellington received intelligence of this bloody repulse, he repaired to St -Sebastian from his headquarters near Pampeluna, and convinced, from the experience be had now bad of the quality of the enemy, that the place was not to be carried without a very considerable addition to the means of attack, which the present exhausted state of the beslegers' ammunition would not permit, it was determined to suspend active operations, and convert the siege into a blockade, until the arrival of the supply of warlike stores from Portsmouth which had been written for a month before, and was hourly expected. They did not arrive, however, in consequence of adverse winds, for a considerable time; ami, meanwhile, a vehement irruption was made by the French force into Spain, which wellingh broke through the investment of Pampelina, raised the siege of St -Sebastian, snatched from Wellington the fruits of his glorious victory, and by damping the hopes of the albed sovereigns in Germany, after the repulse at Dresden, altered the whole face of the war. These disastrons consequences were prevented solely by the herole resistance of a few British brigades, the during intropidity of their leaders, and the happy arrival of Wellington at the scene of danger, at the very moment when further resistance appeared hopeless Such is the value of time in war, and such the magmitude of the consequences which often flow from the heroism or pusillantmity of a single regiment or brigade!

Napoleon No sooner did Napoleon receive Intelligence at Dresden of the buttle of Vittoria, than measuring at once, with prophetic eye, the water of the danger, he disputched Soult, as already mentioned, peared to Napoléon more threatening than it actually proved; for it is now known, that so utterly unprepared were the enemy for the rapidity of Wellington's success, that Bayonne, at the time the English standards approached the Bidassoa, was wholly unprovided for a siege, the guns were not even mounted on the ramparts; and if the English general had been aware of its defenceless state, he might (1), by pushing on, have made himself master of that great frontier fortress almost without firing a shot (2).

Forces which Soult arrived at Bayonne on the 45th of July, and immediately found there. commenced the most active measures for putting that fortress in a state of defence, and reorganizing the wreck of several different armies which were now assembled around its walls. These consisted of the remains of the once formidable armies of the south of Portugal, of the north, and of the centre; but although not a third of any of these immense hosts now remained, yet, being all united together under one head, and having a very narrow frontier to defend, they still presented a formidable force to repel the attacks of the enemy. From the imperial muster-rolls, it appears that the whole force which Soult now had at his disposal in the neighbourhood of Bayonne, amounted to 114,000 men, of whom ninety-eight thousand were present with the eagles—and of these seventy thousand infantry, and above six thousand cavalry were ready for active operations in the field—and the remainder formed the garrisons of St.-Sebastian, Pampeluna, Santona, and Bayonne (3).

(1) Viet. et Conq. xxii. 264.
(2) "In consequence of a blind confidence in his [Napoléon's] good fortune, which a long series of uninterrupted triumphs can hardly excuse, he most important fortress on the southern of uninterrupted triumphs can hardly excuse, Bayonne, the most important fortress on the southern frontier, was not at this moment beyond the reach of a coup de main. Struck with astonishment, the civil and military authorities had taken no steps

Grand total, . . .

whatever for its defence, and the English would have got possession, without firing a shot, of that important fortress, if they had been aware of its situation, and had had the boldness to continue their pursuit through the Pyrences beyond the pass of Bioba."—Victoires et Conquetes, axii. 264. See also Pellor, 23, 24.

(3) Detailed State of the Spanish Army, July 1813, when Soult took the Command,

Right Wing	-Licutenant-	-general R	CILLE.
-	Effective Men.		Total ffective Men.		Effective and Non- effective Me	Grand n. Total,
First Division, Foy, 9 hattalions, 7th Ditto, Maugune, 7 battalions, 9th Ditto, Lamartinière, 11 ditto,	7,127	. 151)	17,235	440	6,748) 5,676 } 8,906 }	21,330
Centre.—	DROUET, Cou	nt D'Enlor	×.
2d Division, D'Armagnac, 8 batts,	. 8,030 . 5,968	116 285 223	959	624	8,580 } 8,728 } 6,627 }	23,935
Left Wing,-	Licutenant-g	general CLA	USEL.
4th Division, Conroux, 9 batts, 5th Ditto, Vandermoeren, 7 ditto, 8th Ditto, Taupin, 10 ditto,	. 7,056 . 4,181 . 5,981	150 141 141	17,218	432	7,477 5,201 7,587	20,265
The second secon	e.—General	_
French, Foreign, 4 battalions of the Rhine, 4 battalions of Italians. General StPol, 4 battalions Spaniards, General Casabianea.	Strength	•	14,959 ot given.		•	17,929
Caral	ry Pierri	SOULT.
22 squadrons,	•	4,416 } 2,275 }	7,081	169,8	5,098 } 2,523 }	7,621
Total, according to the organisation in the fic- foreign battalions,	ld, exclusive	of the	77,452	10,288		91,080
m	Detached.		Men un Arm:		fective and effective M
Troops not in the field,	an, 1st July,	forming	14,9		16,946 part of this number, Cassan, ditto, of Pampeluna, 1st Jul , Lammette, ditto, of Santona, 1st Ma Second Reserve not in the above,	y,		2,73 2,95 1,04 5,59	1 5	3,086 3,121 1,674 6,103
4	SUMMARY.
Grand total	Men.	Horses		ive and N

104,710

10,676

122,016

The forces in Catalonia, at the same time, under Suchet, were about sixty-xix thousand, so that Aspolicon still had one hundred and fifty-six thousand men present under arms to oppose the Albes in the Peninsula, or on the French frontier, and Soult alone had eighty six guns at his command. But although the physical resources of his army were thus great, it was very deficient in spirit and organization, long marches had exhausted the strength, and continued defeats broken the spirit of the soldiers, the divisions of so many different armse were hlended together without any proper arrangement or direction, and vast numbers of soldiers, stragglers from regiments which had been destroyed or lost sight of, were hundled together in disorderly masses, without arms, or officers to direct their movements [4].

But Soult was one of those persons whose resolute and persevering character is eminently qualified to infuse his own spirit into such a disorderly body of troops, and remedy all the defects in organization, equipment, and direction, which previous mismanagement had occasioned Although this eye for tactics in the field was not of the quickest kind, and he was far from possessing the rapidity of conception and decision of execution which distinguished Sapoléon, Ney, and Wellington on the field of battle, yet he was unrivalled in the ability with which he effected the reorganization of his armies and laid out his plans of strategy, and second to none in the tenacity with which he clung to their execution, under circumstances when, to all others, they appeared all but desperate llad he possessed the vigour of Ney on the field of battle, he would have been a perfect general, had he been less inclined to acts of rapacity, his character as a man would have been comparatively unsulfied. Although not of a strong make, and subject to a natural defect in the foot, which might be supposed to injure his seat on horseback (2), yet he was capable of enduring the most severe fatigue, and has unwearied in the diligence nith which he set himself to work to execute any mission with which he was entrusted, or repair any disasters with which he was called upon to contend. Although he subsequently held the most important situations in the royal councils of l'rance, and was more than once entrusted by its sovereign with the supreme direction, both of civil and military affairs, on the most important occasions, yet his fame os a general will mainly rest u non the admirable ability with which he struggled against Wellington in the campaign on which we are now about to enter, on the Pyrences and in the south of France and the interest of the contest between these two great commanders, is not a little enhanced by the cordial union which, long after the termination of the struggle, prevailed between them, and the constancy with which they exerted their great influence in their respective countries to preserve the blessings of peace, when the popular passions on either side were ready to rekindle the flames of war

[&]quot;the direction of Rayonne, so the core of the core of

revent the approach of the enemy to the one where of coneral centre, and Clausel of the left wing was arranged in two dristons—one of dragoons and one of hussars. This force occupied the whole northern issues of the passes of the Pyrenees, from the pass of Roncesvalles on the east, to the mouth of the Bidassoa on the west; and Soult himself established his headquarters at Ascain, where he was indefatigably engaged in organizing his forces and completing his arrangements; while Wellington's headquarters were nearly opposite at Lezaca, within the Spanish territory. With such vigour were Soult's labours conducted, and so admirably was he seconded by the spirit of the inhabitants of Bayonne, and of the adjoining province of Bearn, that in less than a fortnight his preparations were complete, and he was in a condition to take the field. He resolved immediately to re-enter the Spanish territory, and direct his march to Pampeluna, the garrison of which had not now remaining provisions for more than ten days; while that of St.-Sebastian was hourly expected to sink; if the siege were not raised, under the impetuous assault of the British soldiery. Wherefore, after issuing a spirited proclamation to his troops—in which he ascribed their misfortunes to the faults of their commanders, and, without disguising the merits of the British general and army (1), promised again to lead them to victory (2) his whole army was put in motion at daybreak on the 25th, being the very day on which Wellington was engaged at St.-Sebastian in inspecting the works after the failure of the first assault.

Position and strength of the British army.

The Allies mustered, in all, seventy-two thousand combatants of the Anglo-Portuguese army, of whom seven thousand were cavalry, besides twenty-five thousand Spaniards (5). The relative

(1) Wellington to Lord Bathurst, Aug. 1, 1813. Gurw. x. 579. Vict. et Conq. xxii, 265. Behu. iv. 262, 263.

(2) "While Germany was thus the theatre of great events, that enemy who, under pretence of succouring the inhabitants of the Peninsula, has in reality devoted them to ruin, was not inactive. He assembled the whole of his disposable forces—English, Spaniards, and Portuguese—under his most experienced officers; and, relying upon the superiority of his numbers, advanced in three divisions against the French forces assembled upon the Douro. With well-provided forcesses in his frant and rear, a skilful general, enjoying the enfidence of his troops, might by selecting good positions have braved and discomfited this motely levy. But unhappily, at this critical period, timorous and pusillanimons comnsels were followed. The fortresses were abandoned and blown up, hasty and disorderly marches gave confidence to the enemy, and a veteran army—small indeed in number, but great in all that constitutes the military character—which had fought, bled, and triumphed in every fortress in Spain, beheld its glory tarnished, and itself compelled to abandon all its acquisitions—the trophies of many a well-fought and bloody day. When at length the indignant voice of the troops arrested this disgraceful flight, and its enumander, touched with shame, yielded in the general desire, and determined giving battle near Vittoria, who can doubt, from this generous enthusiasm—this fine sense of honnur—what would have been the result had the general been worthy of his troops? had he, in short, made those dispositions and movements, which would have secured to one part of this army the co-operation and support of the other?

"Let us not, however, defraud the enemy of the praise which is due to him. The disposition and arrangements of their general have been primpt, skilful, and consecutive The valour and steadiness of his troops have been praiseworthy; yet do not furget that it is in the benefit of your example they owe their present military character; and that, whenever the relative duties of a French general and his troops have been ably fulfilled, their enemies have commonly had no other resource than flight. Soldiers! I partake your chaggin, your grief, your indignation: I know that the blance of the present situation of the army, is imputable to others; the glory'of repairing it is your own. The Emperor's instructions are, to drive the enemy from yonder lofty heights, which enable him proudly to survey our fertile valleys, and chase him beyond the Ebro. If won, the Spanish soil must hear your tents, and from thence your resources be drawn. No difficulties are insurmountable to your valour and devotion."—Sourt to his Soldiers, 22d July 1813. Guawoop, x. 577.

(3) Forces of the Allied Army in Spain at the following Periods.

No. 1.—Force of the Anglo-Portuguese urmy under the Marquis of Wellington's command, extracted from the original Morning States for the 24th of July 1813,

•	Officers,	Rank and	Total.
	Sergeants, etc.	l'ile.	Men.	Horses.
British and German eavalry present under arms.	916	5,831.	6.750	5,834
Ditto infantry,	4,665	29,926	31,581
Portuguese Cavalry,	251	-1,241	1,492	1,178
Ditto infantry,	2,849	20,565	23,495	_
Total sabres and bayonets, exclusive of sick and ab- sent on command,		57,566	66,282	7,012
Artillerymen and drivers,			4,000
Grand Total,			70,282	14,024

force of the contending armies, therefore, was not materially different, the more especially as the numerous National Guards whom the French general could summon to his standard, of great service in mountain warfire, and well acquainted with the intricacies of the passes, fully compensated the Spanish troops at the command of the English general Both armies occupied a line about eleven leagues in length, from the sea on the left, to the mountains on the westward of the pass of Roncesvalles on the extreme right But there was this difference between the two-and it was a difference which come to be of vital importance in the outset of operations-that although the British were on the higher ground, and occupied passes difficult of access, yet the columns posted in them, separated from each other by maccessible ridges, could only communicate with, or receive support from each other, by a roundabout march of some days in the rear, while the French, who were grouped in the plain, from which necess was easy from one part of the liue to another, could at pleasure throw the weight of their force against the weakest part of the allied line, and overwhelm it by a vehicment irruption, with superior forces, before succour could by possibility be obtained, by tho long circuits in the rear, from the remoter parts of their position (1)

I rupt on of Having concentrated his troops, and selected his point of attack, Soult, at daybreak on the 23th, with thirty-five thousand combatants, ascended the French side of the pass of Roncesvalles, while the panet D'Erlon with the centre, twenty thousand strong, threatened the British centre by the Puerta de Maya, at the head of the valley of Bastan, and Villatto, with eighteen thousand, remained in observation on the Bidassoa Soult's object in this measure was to accumulate forces on Wellington's right more rapidly than the English general could collect forces to oppose him, to relieve Pampeluna, for the revietualling of which he had

N

No 2 - Anglo Partuguese Force estimated from the e	genel No ning	Sate 15 1	3 open 1812
	Officers Segresh a ele	Rank and	Total
Be tal and Gennan Caraley and Infantey	5 859	37 250	43 109
Portuguese D Ho.	4 233	2 214	25 526
Total sabres and beyonets exclus ve of a ck)	10 1/2	55 521	65 635
and absent p a command f Art liers nen and dr sers			4 000
Grand Total			72 635
An lo-Partague a torre from the arrested ?	Same of Sate 16	A October 11	13
Br lish an I Ge man Cavalry and Infantry,	5.238	39 687	45 013
lortuguesed to	2 990	22 731	2> 227
Total sabres a d bayonets exclus re of sick }	$ 310	61 921	~0 270
and absent o connend			4.000
Ccan I To al			14 210

Sr Pouland II Is Force at the bat le of St. Perce as rected from the ong nel Morning Se e of 19th December 1313

SECORD DYS DY

Be tash Portuguese Leco's Portuguese Dirision	$02	$.371	4 173
	277	2 331	2,003
	507	4 183	4.6 9
Total under stuss ext us ve of Let il rymen	1 535	11 903	•,

Arres & Permela De val vap 100 (1) Wellington to Lord Bathurst. Det bugur #823 Gurer 2 $ 8 579 Nap vi 83 91 Edm l 252 2 3

collected a large convoy; and then turning to his own right, descend upon St.-Sebastian and the forces covering the siege, at the same time that his centre and right forced the allied positions in their front. To facilitate this operation, great efforts had been made in the preceding days to smooth the ascent to the pass of Roncesvalles, and three hundred bullocks were in readiness to assist in dragging the guns up the long and toilsome ascent. Sixty pieces of artillery accompanied the centre and left, and the troops each carried provisions for four days' consumption. Though the British officers at the outposts were on the alert, from the movements they observed among the enemy, yet so well had the concentration of the French troops been masked by the intervening heights, and concealed by the peasantry, that they were far from being prepared for the furious onset by which they were suddenly assailed. At daybreak on the 25th, Clausel with three divisions, mustering full eighteen thousand men, commenced an attack on Byng's brigade and Murillo's Spaniards, little more than five thousand strong, who occupied an elevated position five thousand feet above the level of the sea, and on the summit of a craggy ridge of rock at Altobiscar, commanding the higher parts of the pass. The steep ascent soon rung with louder notes than the bugles of Charlemagne; for the British troops, undismayed by the multitude of assai-.lants, made a vigorous resistance: the musketry pealed sharp and long among the rocks, and the advancing columns fell fast beneath the deadly fire which issued from above the clouds. But the French, electrified by the presence of Soult, and burning to efface the recollection of their former defeats, advanced with the utmost intrepidity, and toiled far up the steep; still, however, the British made good the summit, until intelligence was received in the evening that Murillo, assailed by superior forces, had fallen back on the right, while the assailants on the left were making way along the summit of the Airola ridge; wherefore the strong position of the Altobiscar was abandoned, and the British general, united to Cole's division, which had come up from the left during the night, evacuated the great ridge, and descended on the opposite side towards the general rendezvous of the troops in that quarter, in the valley of Zubiri (1).

While the pass of Roncesvalles was thus forced on the allied right, the Puerta de Maya in the centre had also been the theatre of a sanguinary conflict. D'Erlon had early in the morning put himself in motion on the same day, to attack that pass at the head of the valley of Bastan, and thus pour down by another road on the British blockading force around Pampeluna. Hill was there with the second division; and the ground at the summit of the pass was exceedingly strong, consisting of an elevated valley, three miles broad, flanked by lofty rocks and ridges on either side, and presenting scenery of the grandest description. The vale of Estevan, indeed, which leads to it, has at first an air of fertility and beauty; but it narrows as it rises towards the north, and is soon lost in the gloom and desolation of the frontier. Mountains are there crowded together in all varieties of savage magnificence; here crested with grey and jagged rock, there rounded and green upon the summits, to which the panting traveller is led by long and winding paths. The sides of the rugged barrier are strewed with vast, masses of black rock, detached by winter's frosts from the cliffs above; the roads are narrow and stony; the fastness into which they lead, dark and shadowy; and the solitary traveller, in traversing them, in general hears only

⁽¹⁾ Wellington to Lord Bathurst, August 1, 1813, Gurwä x. 579. Nap v. 108, 113. Vict. et Colq. xvii. 267. Pellot's Guerre des Pytences, 23, 24.

actuonledgment

the dash of the waters, which descend in numerous easerdes on all sides, or the scream of the eagles, which float high in the firmment above (1)

The better to conceal his real intentions, Count d Erlon, early on ele tof the the morning of the 23th, made some demonstrations against the small passes of Espegne and Lareta, which lie to the right of that of Maya, and were guarded by the Portuguese, and under cover of these movements, he skilfully brought forward his main body, long concealed from view by the great road leading direct from Urdax up the pass, and they were near the summit before they were perceived. The alarm guns were instantly fired, the piel ets were driven in with heavy loss, and the light companies slowly retired, firing quickly as they fell back, with the most exemplary ster diness Breathless with running up the Spanish side, from the bivouacs a httle below the summit, the British regiments now came up. The 54th and 50th first arrived by companies, and immediately began to fire, and soon slain. Other regiments, particularly the 71st and 82d, were brought up, and maintained the pass long and bravely against the enemy but it was all in vain, they were literally forced back, and sullenly retreated across the ridge, still resolutely combating So long continued and obstinate was the fight, that the whole ammunition of the 82d was exhausted, and at length, as they still kept their ground, they were reduced to roll down stones on the enemy. In this desperate condition, the Albes were driven back to the last ridge of the pass, and were on the point of abandoning the crest of the mountain altogether, when Barnes, with a brigade of the 7th division, came up from Leballar, and by a brilliant charge with the 6th regiment, drove the French back to the first summit of the range in this disastrous and bloods combat,

Ir beneutsam stale aran fe nr saformal on hav graced The ring yie. No ne en do be the ju ce of il s cul g u u o ti e reg ment I ut the for Oct 1$10 p 42 state e t of 1 s he , composed pet e polly of

The follow g s the state of the 921 Re, meet at thet ne of the battle in the Puerto le Nayat -Pe uru of the 1 umb r of each country coupes, all e 1st ha tal ou of the 92d H gl and Rea er t taken

1913 fro the Ir e I at \ ttor Pr v Total Conn ry Carp Dum Scotland 47 8 731 295 9 11

Ircland 2 1 45 61 š 4 Fore gn 11 17 3 890 1013 14

Grand Total Copy extracted from laspect on Report 1st Patial on 92d II gland Pegiment 15 h October 1813

13 -02 $22 wotla d 31 36 Lugland trela d. 52 67 ı l ort gn #19

-01 Grand Total 62 41 For these to Scatsmen interesting deta a the sollor a indeleted to the kind can of then cannot Calcord Maclocald the present commander of that dig new hed sorps to whom he is happy to make this police the Allies had fifteen hundred men killed, wounded, and made prisoners; the French lost, by their own admission, as many, but they won the pass, and took four pieces of cannon (1).

So far, the most brilliant success had crowned Soult's operations: gamed by he had unknown to the British, accumulated the bulk of his forces this day's operations, against his right, and thrown himself in such strength on the two principal passes leading to Pampeluna, that they were both won. Final success seemed inevitable; for if the Allies had been unable to make good the summit of the hill, with all the advantages of ground in their favour, it was not to be expected that they could arrest the victorious enemy in the course of the rapid descent, not above twenty miles in length from either of these passes, to the ramparts of Pampeluna. If the French generals had been as well aware as Soult was of the inestimable importance of time in all, but especially mountain warfare, it is more than probable that this would have been the result, and a new aspect been given to the campaign, and possibly the fortunes of the war, by the raising of the siege of St.-Sebastian and the blockade of Pampeluna. But D'Erlon, satisfied with having won the Puerla de Maya, remained there on the night of the 25th, without following up his successes; and Reille's three divisions, which had received orders to march from St.-Jean Pied-de-Port for Airola and Lindous on the preceding day, lost much precious and irreparable time in incorporating some conscripts which had come up with their respective regiments, so that they did not ascend the rocks of Airola in time to seize that important pass before the British troops had got through. Thus, though the crest of the mountains was won, no de cisive blow had been struck; and the allied and French troops, after nearly equal mutual slaughter, were wending their way down the valleys on the southern slope of the Pyrenees (2).

On the morning of the 26th, Soult's march was retarded by a to the neigh-thick fog which hung on the higher parts of the mountains; he at bourhood of Pampeluna. length, however, got into motion, and descended the valley in pursuit of the British; but he soon found that in mountain warfare, though the assailant may have the advantage in the first onset, difficulties accumulate around him as lie advances, if opposed by a resolute and persevering adversary. Cole, who was retreating down the valley from Roncesvalles, met Picton, who had lurried to the scene of danger in advance of his division, which, however, had crossed the hills and reached Zubiri, a few miles in his rear. Thither the British generals immediately retreated, with some sharp combats in the rearguard; and the two divisions united, now mustering eleven thousand bayonets, offered battle on the ridge in front of Zubiri: but Soult declined to attack, being desirous, before he did so, of being joined by D'Erlon or Reille's divisions; and, as they did not come up before night, he let fall some expressions of displeasure, discovering a secret apprehension of failure. Next day, Picton, with both divisions, now under his command, eontinued his retreat towards Pampeluna, desiring to concentrate his forces and give battle at SAUROREN, four miles in front of that fortress. Hill, finding his right uncovered, and being severely weakened by the combat of Maya, followed in the same direction down the valley of Bastan; and the mountain passes in the centre and right of the British position being now all abandoned, alarm and dismay spread far and wide in the rear. All the valleys leading down to Navarre were filled with baggage waggons, mules, artillery, and convoys, falling back in confusion; and rumour, with prevent their falling into the enemy's hands; and he would have raised the blockade entirely, had not Bon Carlos b'Espana fortunately come up at the moment with his corps, and restored some sort of order in the besieging force (1).

⁽¹⁾ Wellington to Lord Bathurst, Aug. 1, 1813. (2) Pellot, 25, 26. Nap. vi. 113, 114. Vict, et Guiw. x. 579. Scherer, ii, 247. Nap. v. 118, 122. Conq. xxii, 268. Pellot, 26, 27. Vict, et Conq. xxii. 267, 268.

Wellington was on his way back from St -Sebastian when he ren ethug certed intelligence of Soult's irruption-bot only of the one at the pass of Maya; and as he did not conceive it possible, that with no hea log of larger force than D'Erlon had, he would oftempt to peoctrate the British lines, he thought that attack was only a feint, and that the real attentpt would be made on the lower Bidassoa, to raise the siege of St -Sebastian In the course of the night, however, correct accounts arrived of the Roncesvalles and Maya combats, and he immediately adopted the same measures as Napoléon had done at Mantua in 1796, and Sunarrow at the same fortress in 1799 (2), by ordering Graham instantly to raise the siege, einbark the stores and guns, and liasten with all his disposable forces to the support of Giron, in a defensive position previously selected for battle, on the southern side of the Bidassoa. These orders were punctually executed; and, meanwhile, Wellington set out on horseback with the utmost speed to ioin Picton and Cole's divisions in their position in front of Pampeluna As he entered the village of Sauroren, he saw Clausel's division moving along the crest of the mountain opposite, which made an alteration of his dispositions odvisable. He immediately dismounted, wrote the necessary orders in pencil on the parapet of the bridge, sent them off by Lord Fitzroy Somerset, the only one of his staff who had been able to keep up with his racing speed, and rode alone up the ascent to join the British troops. The moment he was descried, a shout was raised by the nearest battalion, which spread along the line till the very mountain re-echoed with the clang; and the " in their advance till they as-· Is on the opposite sides were tack was made that day, and, before the next, such removements attract of enabled Wellington to resume the offensive and complete his victor. A sharp fire of muskery clong the front of the line, indeed, commenced at six o'clock in the evening; but a dreadful storm soon after arose, and prevented any important operations on either aids till the following day.

Larly on the morning of the 28th, the sixth division, to the infi-

⁽¹⁾ Non vi 123 125 Scherer il 245 La Pene (3 Nop vi 129 130 Film 29 29 Valler

⁽³ Nam vi 129 130 Falst 21 27 Nam vi Cong xali 213 Johnson a Life of Factor 1717 225 Well agten to Lord Sattures, Aug. 1, 1812 Gurn x 510, 581.

heretofore invisible, the French columns recoiled, still bravely combating, and strewed their numerous slain along the line of their retreat (1) While this bloody repulse was going on upon the British left in the or lre the valley of the Lanz, a conflict of unequalled severity was raging along the top of the ridge in the centre and right. Without any proper unity in their efforts, but with surpassing valour, Clausel's other divisions rushed up the steep face of the mountum, and undismayed by a plunging fire, which in many cases swept off half their battalions, worked their toilsome way up to the top In some instances their extraordinary gal lantry met with deserved though but temporary success. The Seventh Portuguese Cacadores shrunk from the terrible encounter on the summit, and the French established themselves for a few minutes on their part of the left of the ridge, but Ross's British brigade, instantly advancing, charged with a loud shout, and hurled them down the steep Again they returned, however, reinforced to the charge another Portuguese regiment on Poss's right wing having given way, the French penetrated in at the opening, and that heroic brighde, assailed at once in front and flink, was compelled to give ground Instantly the assarlants stood on his position on the summit, their line began to deploy to a considerable breadth on either side, and the crest of the mountain, enveloped in cloud and flame, seemed already won. In this extremity Wellington ordered up Byng's brigade, which advanced in double-quick time, the 27th and 18th were brought down from the higher ground in the centre, with indescribable fury they charged the crowded masses on the summit, and the whole were rolled in wild confusion over the rocks, and lost half their numbers under the British bayonet. In the course of this desperate conflict, the gallant fourth division surpassed all its former exploits, every regiment charged with the bayonet (2), some of them four different times, and the herore hoss had two horses shot under him Meanwhile Reifle's dist sion, on the left of Clausel's third division, had environed the right of the position above the Gny stream, where Murillo's Spaniards were placed, an l, mounting fiercely the hill-side, dislodged them, after a brave resistance, from their ground on the left of the 10th British regiment A Portuguese battalion, gallantly advancing, took its place in their room beside that noble corps, which waited in stern silence until the French set their feet on the I road summit, "but when their glittering arms appeared over the brow of the mountain, the charging ery w sheard, the crowded mass was broken to pieces, and a tempest of bullets followed its flight. I our times this assault was renewed, and the French officers were seen to pull up their tired men by the belts, so fierce and resolute were they to win But it was the ful our of Systplans The vehement shout and shock of the British soldiers always prevailed, and at last, with thinned ranks, tired limbs, and hearts hopiless from repe ited failures, they were so abashed, that three British companies suffeed to bear down a whole brigade (5) "

Disconcerted by this bloody repulse, Soult drew off his forces Souther to towards evening, and resumed his former position on a range of hills opposite to Wellington's Just then the heads of D Erlon's columns began to appear on the right, that general having during the action tenetrated to within a league of Pampeluna and been prevented from reaching that fortress, chiefly by the violent fire which he heard in his rear, which

^{(1) %3}p. v; (31 437 Well ag on to Lard Rail urst Augu 11 1813 Gree 2 381 Scherer ; a5g Vict, et (a 19 22 1 459 (2) The 40th 7th, 20th and 23d, --Graw, n. 55%

⁽³⁾ Yap al 135 (10 Pellot on 35 c herer i 251 2 2 Net. et Conq ax Locy ited agree to Leed Bathurs Au, 1 1"11, bare a 33

made by the British centre, which now descended from its stronghold above the village of Sauroren, on the French centre, which still held its old posi-

gade which scaled the heights on the left of the French position. The effect of these advances and attacks, which were all made at the same time, and with that enthusiastic ardour which springs from the universal transport at returning victory, was to force the enemy to abandon entirely his position, and retreat up the vallers of the Lanz and the Guy towards Olegue and Zubiri. Sauroren was now earried by storm by Bing's division and Madden's Portuguese, amidst deafening cheers, and fourteen hundred prisoners made, The whole valley was filled with smoke, which appeared to Dalhousie's men on the heights like aguated foam in the hollon; while the roar of the camion and rattle of the musketry were re-echoed with anful effect from mountain to mountain. This general attack relieved the pre-sure on Hill, who had been assailed on the extreme British left by such superior forces early in the morning, that he was driven with considerable loss from the range of heights which he occupied to another in his rear in front of Marcalain; but Dalhonsie's able movement compelled the enemy to retire in their turn; and at length both parties, thoroughly exhausted, sunk to sleep on their stony beds above the clouds. The Allies in this day's combats lost nineteen finndred men, of whom two-thirds were Portuguese, upon whom the weight of the action had fallen, and to whom its chief glory belonged; but the French nero neakened by an equal number killed and nounded, and in addition three thousand prisoners were made, and great numbers dispersed and lost in the woods and ravines (1).

Received Soult, after this disastrous defeat, communed his retreat on the day seemed following with all possible expedition up the valleys of the Lanz and feature of the control of the c of the Pyrences Graham, with twenty thousand, was ready to stop upin on the side of St.-Sebashan; and it was only by an extraordinary exertion of skill and ecolness that his army in these circumstances was preserved from total ruin. He directed his retreat, not by the valley of fastan towards the Pierta de May, as D'Erlon had entered, but by the pass of Donia Varia towards the ready in the State of Pierta of Pierta of State of Pierta of Piert

⁽⁴⁾ We sington to Lord Erid west, August 2, 1833 Guern 2, 581-552. Nat. vi. 140-143 Febb., 73. R Robs some Pericon, in 220 2.6. June he 500 1 re-sund 1 rently years ago, the subserveewed a most interest or account of three days estimate from his mobile and Invancied friend Land Britalaunt, who how set ad singuisting a part is their house, who how set ad singuisticked parts at their house, who how set ad singuisticked parts at their

The lepse of that long period has taken sock of from the v sidness of the empires on predicted by he grophe surrater of two on the table for evil a deal is fa great partialities, and which perfect a conceiler on it the point one of the transparent down in Wyld and a sake plans of these he they Wellington's troops had now almost entirely enclosed Soult's main body in a net, from which it seemed impossible for him to escape: for his soldiers, unconscious of their danger, were grouped close together in the deep and narrow valley of Estevan: three British divisions and one Spanish, under Wellington, were on his right flank concealed by the mountains; Hill was close behind him; Dalhousie held the pass of Donna Maria, which he had just won: Byng was at Maya, at the head of the valley; the light division would in two hours block it up at Estevan; and Graham was marching to close the only other exit from the valley by Vera and Echallar. Dispirited and worn out as his men were, Soult was in no condition to force any of these formidable defiles, defended by victorious troops, and his surrender seemed inevitable. So hopeful was the English general of such a result, that, screened by the rocks from behind which he surveyed the whole valley, he prohibited his men from issuing forth to capture Soult himself, who was seen riding in a carcless way along its bottom, lest the catastrophe should awaken the French army from its perilous dream of security, and issued the strictest orders that not a man should show himself from behind the ridge which concealed them from the enemy. At this moment, when every bosom beat high with exultation at the expected glorious trophy of their valour they were so soon to obtain, in the surrender of a whole army with a marshal of France at its head, three British marauders issued from their concealment, to plunder in the valley. The sight of the red coats was not lost upon Soult, who instantly perceived the imminence of his danger: his whole army was immediately put in motion, and hurried towards the passes leading to the Lower Bidassoa, which they got through just before the Spainards under Longa, or the light division, could come up to close the terrible defiles! Such is war: the disobedience to orders by three soldiers saved France from the greatest calamity, and deprived England of the greatest triumph, recorded in the annals of either monarchy (1).

It soon appeared from what a fearful danger the emerging of these disaster in the defiles of marauders from this retreat had delivered the French army. In their last march to the defiles of Echallar, when the army was hurrying forward to win the pass before the enemy, great part of the French army, now thoroughly discouraged, broke its ranks and dispersed. Soult, who was endeavouring to form a rearguard to arrest the pursuit of the enemy, was seized with indignation when he beheld the disorderly bands which in wild confusion came hurrying forward. "Cowards," said he, "where are you flying to? You are Frenchmen, and you are runuing away! In the name of honour, halt and face the enemy!" Stung by these reproaches, twelve hundred men rallied under the directions of the marshal and his aides-de-camp, and formed a sort of rearguard; but the remainder fled on without intermission, and the torrent of fugitives rolled impetuously down, with the roar and whirl of a mighty rapid, to the defiles of Yanzi and Echallar. Before they got there the head of the column was as much disordered as the rear; the weather was oppressively sultry; and though the great body of the bewildered mass found vent during the night by the latter defile, yet a frightful scene ensued next day when Reille's divisions were rolling through by the gorge of Yanzi. The French were there wedged in a narrow road, between inaccessible rocks on the one side and the river on the other. While stringgling through this dreadful pass, the head of the light division reached the summit of the precipice, and immediately began firing down on the deuse throng.

Inde-cribable confusion followed, the cavalry drew their swords, and charged through the pass, the infinity were trumpled under foot, numbers, horses and all, were precipitated into the river some in despair fired vertically un at the summit of the chills, the wounded implored quarter as they were rolled over the brink, and hing suspended, yet bleeding, on the branches of trees over the rouring torrent. So puteous was the scene, that many even of the from veterins of the light division cersed to fire, or discharged their meees with averted gare. With such circumstances of horror did the last columns of that mighty host leave Spain, who but a few days before had mounted the pass of Roncesvalles buoyant with spirit, and in all the pride of apparently arresistible strength 1 And yet the disaster, great as it was to the French arms, would have been still greater if all the men had been able to reach their ground at the time assigned them, for longa's division, if they had come up in time, would have rendered the pass of Yanzi altogether impassable to the disorderly torrent of Soult's masses, and though the light division marched forly miles in nuncteen hours, and hore their extraordinary fatigues with surprising spirit, yet, if they had not lost their was in the wilds, they would have been two hours earlier at the perilous bridge, and none of Reille's division would have escaped (1)

Consider Next day the French troops, at all points, examined the Spanish results territory, and both armies nearly resulted the positions they had held before Soult's irruption took place. Before they recrossed the francer, however, an incident occurred, which showed, in a striking manner, how the studences of the bravest troops may be shaken, even in a short time, by a series of disasters. Clausel's division were the list which remained on the

A superior of the control of

they were fifteen hundred against six thousand, and the enemy held a position as strong as the rocks of Sauroren Such was the spirit, however, with which the Brilish army was now animated, that this bandful of heroes acthally a saulted and drove the enemy from the rugged heights, mindst the enthusiastic cheers of the whole troops who witnessed this heroic exploit And not the brench were the same men who, a few days before, had all but won, against similar natural difficulties, the bloods steeps of Sauroren (1msel's men, thus dislodged, fell back to a strong ridge beyond the pass of Echallar, covered by the lyantelly rock, which was strongly occurred. I ut they were not permitted to rest in this last stronghold. As evening came on, and a dark mist crowned the cloud-capped summit of the chif occupied by the brench, the riflemen of the 45d, whom Co'onel Barnard led to the attack, nere soon lost to the view, but the sharp clang of musketry resounded in the clouds, and crelong a British shout was heard from the shrouded summit, and the last French were hurled in confusion down the steep from the Spamsh soil (21.

Resit of the irruption of Soult into the Spanish territors does the highest into the Indoor to his person energe character, and skill in the movements of present strateer which preceded the final shock, but it may be duilted

⁽¹⁾ Cookes Narrative $4.1° Police $1.35 "No" approached Eulers Aug. 2.1612 Nag. vv. 435, 462 Wedlerton be Largh Rational Codes $ 35° 352 Nag. 11.11.15 (4) kg. 1813 Codes $ 357-357

whether his vigour and firmness at the decisive moment were equal to the ability of his previous conceptions. With an overwhelming force he had thrown himself on the British right, and gained such success before succour could arrive, that the issue seemed no longer doubtful, when victory was snatched from his grasp, and a succession of disasters brought on the French arms, attended in the end with the most decisive effects upon the ultimate issue of the war. There can be no doubt that the vigour with which the stroke, thus happily conceived, was followed up at the decisive moment, was by no means proportioned to the felicity of its original conception. Soult was in front of the rocks of Sauroren with thirty thousand men on the evening of the 26th, when only two divisions, eleven thousand of the Anglo-Portuguese, were assembled to stop his progress. Had he attacked that night or next day with such a preponderance of force, it can hardly be doubted that he would have succeeded; and, supported by the ramparts of Pampelina, he might have seen with indifference the arrival of the sixth, and all the subsequent divisions of the British army which came up on the 28th and 29th. Wellington's right wing was undonbtedly in one sense out-generaled—that is, it was assailed by a force greatly superior to that anticipated, or for which it was prepared—and the troops at the Maya pass were clearly surprised; but this is unavoidable in mountain warfare, where the attacking party may select his own point of onset, and the attacked cannot, from intervening ridges, obtain succour till after a long time, and a painful circuit in the rear; and Soult experienced the same, in his turn, in the forcing of his position shortly after on the Nive. On the other hand, the rapidity with which the British general gathered up all his forces to the menaced point; the firmness with which he held his ground in the first instance against a vast superiority of force; and the admirable combinations by which, in the subsequent advance, he defeated all Soult's attempts, and all but made him prisoner with thirty thousand men, are worthy of the highest admiration, and justly place the battles of the Pyrences among the most brilliant of Wellington's martial achievements. The French loss, from the time of their entering Spain on the 25th July, till their evacuating it, was not less than fifteen thousand men, including four thousand unwounded prisoners; that of the British was seven thousand and ninety-six men, of whom four thousand seven hundred and fifty-six were British soldiers; but, what is very remarkable, such was the effect of the trumpet of war in bringing hack the stragglers, loosened by the Vittoria plunder, to their standards, that the muster-rolls after the battles exhibited only fifteen hundred less than those taken before they commenced (1).

Renewal of the first object which occupied the attention of the English genthe siege of St.-Se bastian, which had been so rudely interrupted. The governor had made good use of the hreathing-time thus afforded him by the cessation of active operations, in repairing the hreaches in the sea-wall, retrenching the interior parts of the rampart, and taking every imaginable precaution against a second assault. In particular, he had constructed out of the ruins of the houses which had heen destroyed, immediately helind the

⁽¹⁾ Wellington to Sir T. Graham, Aug. 4, 1813. Gurw. x. 592. Belm. i. 265, and to Earl Liverpool. Aug. 4, 1813. Gurw. x. 596.

[&]quot;That vain attempt cost the French army nineteen hundred killed, eight thousand five hundred and forty wnunded, and two thousand seven hundred prisoners; in all thirteen thousand one hundred men."—Belenk, Journaux des Sièges dans la Peninsule, i. 265, The prisoners taken were really four thousand, which shows that this estimate is in somo respects below the truth, though founded on official documents, and probably very near it. See—Williagon to long laversoot, 4th August 1815, where he says, "Their loss cannot be less than fifteen thousand, and I am not sure if it is not twenty thousand; we have four thousand prisoners."—Gunwood, x. 597.

great breach, a second or interior rampart, parallel to the outer, very thick, and fifteen feet high, with salient bastions, which it was hoped would entirely stop the progress of the enemy, even if they won the front wall. During the intermission of active operations, the efforts of the English were confined to a blockade position taken up on the heights of St -Bartholomen, which were much strengthened, and o distant fire upon the men engaged in these vast underlakings; and they lost two hundred Portuguese in a sally made by the garrison in the night of the 26th July. But whee Soult was finally driven back, matters soon assumed a very different aspect. The heavy guns which had been shipped at Passages were all relanded, and again placed in hattery; a fleet of transports, with twenty-eight additional pieces of great calibre, and immense stores, arrived from Portsmouth, and they were soon succeeded by as many more from Woolwich; and the battering train, with the guns landed from the ships, now amounted to the large number of a hundred and eighteen pieces, including twelve sixty-eight pounders. By the night of the 25th this immense train of ortillery was all in readiness, and fifty-seven pieces actually in the batteries; and on the morning of the 26th they reopened their fire with a roar so awful, that, reechoed os it was from all the rocks and precipiees in the wooded amplitheatre oround, it seemed as if no force on earth could withstand the attack. The fire continued without intermission for the next four days, and before the 30th sixty-three guns were in constant practico, two wide breaches were gaping, and seemed easy of ascent, the fire of the place was almost entiroly silenced, and three mines had been run in front of the odvonced batteries on the isthmus, close under the sea-wall, in order to counteract any mines of the enemy near the great breach. Still the brave governor, after informing Soult of his desperate situation, was resolute to stand asceed assault, olthough his resistance of the first had fulfilled to the letter Aspoleon's generol orders; and the storm was ordered for the 51st at noonday (1).

Commence. At two in the morning of the 51st, the three mines were exploded under the sea-wall, and brought it completely down. At this owful signal the brave garrison all repaired to their posts, each ormed with several muskets; and, relying on the successful resistance of the former assault, confidently anticipated the defeat of the present. Nor was their confidence without reason; for, notwithstanding the vastly increased means now at the disposal of the besiegers, they had not yet beat down the enemy's parapets nor established a lodgement in the bornwork, so that the assaulting columns would be exposed when near the breach to a destructive fire in flank-a fatal error, contrary to Mauban's rules, and which was only washed out by torat nare of some of the troops rents of Britisl ot the former regiments in .. it, " who could show other troops how to mount a breach. I citi, however, who had resumed the command of the fifth division, by whom the former to 1 a) been made, was urgent that his men should be ollowed the post

Snodgrass of the 52d, had on the preceding meth toroid; the opposite the smaller breach, clambered up its face at midnight, and looked down on the town! After the troops in the trenches were all under arms, deep anxiety pervaded every bosom; and before orders were given for the forlorn hope to move forward, the excitement felt had become almost intolerable. The heroic band took its station at halfpast ten; the tide, which all watched, was fast ebbing; the enemy's preparations were distinctly visible—the glancing of hayonets helind the parapets, the gims pointed towards the breach, the array of shells and fire barrels along its summit, told but too clearly the awful contest which awaited them. Little was said in the assaulting columns; the bravest occasionally changed colour; the knees of the most resolute smote each other, not with fear hut anxiety; and time seemed to pass with such leaden wings, that the watches were looked to every half minute. Some laughed ontright, they knew not why; many addressed a mental prayer to the throne of grace. The very elements seemed to have conspired to increase the impressive character of the moment; a close and oppressive heat pervaded the atmosphere, lowering and snlphnrons clouds covered the sky, large drops fell at intervals, and the very animals, awestruck by the feeling of an approaching tempest, were silent in the camp and on the hills (4).

Dreadful as- Noon lind harely passed, when, the tide heing considered sufficiently fallen, the signal to advance was given. Silently the men moved forward, and not a shot was fired till the column had reached the middle of the stream, when such a tempest of grape, musketry, and canister was at once opened upon it, as wellnigh choked the Urumea with the killed and the wounded. With dauntless intrepidity, however, the survivors pressed through the now crimsoned waves, and soon gained the strand on the opposite side, headed by the gallant Lientenant M'Gnin of the 4th, who led the forlorn hope, and rushed on, conspicuous from his plume, noble figure, and huoyant courage. Two mines were exploded rather prematurely by the enemy under the covered way of the hornwork; but they crushed only twenty men, and the column, hounding impetuously forward, streamed up the great breach, and soon reached its summit. There, however, they were assailed by a dreadful tempest of grape, sliells, and hand-grenades, while the head of the column found it impossible to get down into the town, as the reverse of the breach consisted of a wall twelve or fourteen feet high, the bottom of which was filled with sword hlades placed erect, and every kind of offensive ohstacle, while the newly constructed rampart 'within, and the ruins of the houses burned on occasion of the former assault, were lined with grenadiers, who kept up so close and deadly a fire, that the whole troops who reached the summit were almost instantly struck down. Still fresh troops pressed on; the Urumea incessantly resounded with the splash of successive columns hurrying forward to the scene of carnage, until the whole fifth division was engaged; the volunteers from the different corps, who had with difficulty been restrained, were now let loose, and rushed on, calling out that they would show how a hreach should be mounted. Soon the crowded mass made their way up the face of the ruins, won the summit, and with desperate resolution strove to get over by a few ruined walls, which connected the back of the old with the front of the new rampart. Vain attempt! A steady barrier of steel awaited them on the other side, the bravest who got across were bayoneted or thrown down into the gulf below, and after two hours of mortal strife, the heroic defenders still made good the dreadful pass, and not a living man was to be seen on the breach. As a last resource, Major Snodgrass, with his Portuguese battalion, volunteered to make a simultaneous assault on the lesser breach; but here, too, the slaughter was dreadful—a shower of grape smote the head of the column, and the obstacles proved insuperable, even to the most ardent valour. Matters seemed desperate—the Urumea was rapidly rising, and would soon become impassable; the great breach was choked with the dead and the dyog, and already the shouls of victor; were heard from the French ramparts (1).

In this extremity, Craham, having consulted with Colooel Dickson of the engineers, adopted one of the boldest, and yet, with his artillerymen, safest expedients recorded in military amals. He ordered that the valoe guns of the Chofre hatteries shoold be brought to bear upon the high curtain above the breach in the demi-hastions, from which the most destructive fire issued; while the British solders at the foot of the rampart remained quescent, or lay down, while the shot flew only two feet over their heads! In a few intenses, forty-seven guns were in this manner directed in the such effect on the traverses, that they were in great part broken down, and the troops who manned them were obliged to reture to more distant cover, and yet so accurate was the aim, that not one man among the assaulants was struct. Thenly the ramparts for the close defence of their traverses and interior works; the flame ran olong the walls, and soon the whole exploded with a bright flash, succeeded by a smoke so dense as to obscure all vision. Three hundred brace Trenchmen were blown into the air by the blowing up of the L'Orient at the Mil a minute not a shot was fired either from length, as the smoke and dust cleared away, the British troops, seeing an empty space before them, rushed forward, and with an appalling shout made themselves masters of the first traverse. The defenders, however, even at this terrible moment, soon railted, and a firrce conflict, breast against breast, bryonet against bayonet, ensued at the top of the high curtain; and for some tion of the besieged. The French colonis on the taratit with tota of in-, Lieutenant Gethin of the 11th; the hornwork and ravehin on the flank of the great breach were abandoned, while about the same time, Snodgrass, with his valiant Portuguese, stormed the lesser breach; and the bulk of the garrison, now every where overpowered, were rapidly driven from all their interior retrenchments, and songht reduge with the governor in the castle (2), leaving seven hundred prisoners resend from instant death, in the hands of the vectors.

And now commenced a scene which has affixed as lasting a stain on the character of the English and Portuguese troops, as the heroic valour they displayed in the assault has given them enduring and evalted fame. The long endurance of the assault, which had continued hi morth strice for three hours, the fearful slaughter of their contracts which had taken place at the breables, had wrought the soldiers up to perfect modres; the lattle which occurred the same day with the centre and right wing at $2m Marcial, prevented fresh columns of troops from being introduced, and, as not unusual in such eases, while they spared their enemies who were made prisoners with arms in their hands, the soldiers wreaked their vengeance with fearful violence on the unhappy inhabitants. Some of the houses adjoining the breaches had taken fire from the effects of the explosion; and the flames, fanned by an awful tempest of thunder and lightning, which hurst on the town just as the ramparts were carried, soon spread with frightful rapidity; while the wretched inhabitants, driven from house to house as the conflagration devoured their dwellings, were soon huddled together in one quarter, where they fell a prey to the unbridled passions of the soldiery. Attempts were at first made by the British officers to extinguish the flames, but they proved vain amidst the general confusion which prevailed; and soon the soldiers broke into the burning houses, pillaged them of the most valuable articles they contained, and rolling numerous spirit-casks into the streets, with frantic shouts emptied them of their contents, till vast numbers sunk down like savages, motionless, some lifeless, from the excess. Carpets, tapestry, beds, silks, and satins, wearing apparel, jewellery, watches, and every think valuable, were seattered about upon the bloody pavements, while fresh bundles of them were continually thrown down from the windows above, to avoid the flames, and caught with demoniac yells by the drunken crowds beneath. Amidst these scenes of disgraceful violence and unutterable woe, nine-tentlis of the once happy smiling town of St.-Schastian were reduced to ashes; and what has affixed a yet darker blot on the character of the victors, deeds of violence and cruelty were perpetrated, hitherto rare in the British army, and which cause the historian to blush, not merely for his country, but his species (1).

Reflections Let not the French writers fear that such atrocities will be palon these atrocities. liated or excused because they occurred beneath the English standard. Justice knows no distinction of country; humanity acknowledges no exense for cruelty; and they are purposely transcribed from the contemporary records, as an eternal damning blot on the past, and warning to the future (2). A consideration of these mournful scenes, combined with the recollection of the mutual atrocities perpetrated by both parties on each other in England during the wars of the Roses, the horrors of the Tyrone rebellion in Ireland, the cold-blooded vengeance of the Covenanters after the battle of Philiphaugh in Scotland, the systematic firing and pillage of London during Lord George Gordon's riots in 1780, and the brutal violence in recent times of the Chartists in England, suggest the painful doubt whether all. mankind are not at bottom the same, in point of tendency to crime, when

(1) Vict. et Cooq. xxii. 278, 279. Subaltern, 59, 61. Nap. vi. 205, 206. Southey, vi. 240.
(2) "Oh wretched day! oh cruel night! The troops seemed to neglect the must ordinary precautions in a place recently taken, and, with one end of it still in the enemy's hands, to give themselves up to the most unheard of excesses. Pillage, assassination, rape, were pushed to an incredible pitch; and the fire, which broke out early in the night, ofter the enemy had retired to the castle, put the ficishing stroke to this seene of wee. On all sides were heard cries of distress from women who were violated, without regard either to tender youth, respected family, or advanced years; women were outraged in presence of their husbands, daughters dishonoured in presence of their parents; one girl was the victim of the brutality of a soldier on the corpse of her mother! Other crimes were horrible still, which our pen refuses to record, were committed in that awful night; and the disorders continued for some days after, without any efficient steps being taken to arrest them. Of above six hundred houses of which St. Sebastian consisted on the morning of the assault, there remained at the end of three days only thirty six."—Manifeste par la Junte Constitutionelle, le Chapitre ecclisiastique et les habitans de St.-Sebastian—given in Vict. et Conq. Wellington had done all in his power to save the town; he had purposely avoided a bombardinent to space the citizens, and both he and Graham, as well as the officers engaged, did their utmost to stop the Sept 8. fire, and svoid the disorders; but all their elforts were ineffectual, from the impossibility of bringing up fresh soldiers to occupy the town after the assault, as is usual in such cases, from the employment of the whole troops not engaged in it, on the same day, at the battle on the Bidasson .- See Wellington to Spanish Minister at War, 17th Sept, 1813. Gurw. x. 353.

exposed to the influence of the same temptations; and whether there do not be smouldering beneath the boasted glories of British civilization, the embers of a conflagration as fierce, and devastation as wide-spread, as those which followed and disgraced the French Revultion.

beer and Though the town of St.-Sebastian was taken, the citadel remained the citadel to be reduced; and such was the tenacity and hardthood of the governor and his brave adherents, that, hopeful of deliverance from the effort they were aware Marshal Soult was to make in their favour, they still consumed nueteen days in a hombardment to induce the garrison to surrender. Wellington, however, having visited the works on the 1st September, resolved to push the approaches, notwithstanding there obstacles, and at the same time try the effect of a hombardment and cannonade on the castle. A heavy fire was kept up from mortars till the 8th, when the breaching batterness from the side of the town having been completed, a tremendous fire was opened from sixty pieces of heavy artillery, which played with such effect, that every thing in the eastle was form up in destroyed before it. The English prisoners suffered even more than the garrison from this terrific tempest; for $\frac{8}{8}pt \graph 9.

Rod et as The seege of St. Sebastian, a third-rate fortiers, garrisoned only three thousand men, hastly got together during the three thousand eight hundred one, two thousand five hundred of the battle of Vittorn, cost the allied arms.

three thousand eight hundred men, two thousand the limited down

' were strick down

' rece days, of which gave time to Soult corganize his army, and make two desperate attacks, one towards Pampe to reorganize his army, and make two desperate attacks, one towards Painpeliuna, another, which shall be immediately noticed, on the Budavox, to re-establish his affairs, and delayed by above three mouths the invasion of the southern provinces of France. The Allies expended on the siege no less than 71,000 rounds of ammunition, and were obliged to place see eith placy segments in battery. It must be admitted, that a stronger proof can britily be linigated of the vital consequence of fortresses in war, or of the decivice effect which the conrageous defence even of an inconsiderable stronghold often has upon the fortunes of a campaign, or the fate of a minurely. The defence of the French governor and parties on was skilled and heroe in the highest degree, and justly entitles them to place their prolonged resistance among the brightest military glories of their country. But, notwithstanding all their extrems, the place must have fallen in half the time, if it had not been for obvious faults, both in the conduct of the siege, and those who had the direction of forwarding supplies to carry it on, from Great Britain. The first assault in July should have succeeded, and would have done so, if the troops who composed the rear of the column had duly followed the advance of their heroic leaders. The last assault was rendered so murderous as it was, chiefly hecause the engineers had not adopted the precaution of knocking away the parapets of the traverses whieli commanded the breach, before they declared it practicable; and of the facility with which this might have been done, and the vast effects with which it was attended, decisive proof is to be found in the statement of Colonel Jones-" that the tremendous enfilade fire on the high curtain, while the troops were at the foot of the breach, though only maintained for twenty minutes, had dismounted every gun but two. Many of the pieces had their muzzles shot away; the stone parapets were damaged; the cheeks of the embrasures knocked off; and the terrepleine cut up and strewed with headless bodies (4)."

But more than all, the authorities at home were to blame for not scoding out sending out military stores in time to carry on the siege. They were written for in the end of June by Wellington, but did not arrive till the sirge the 18th and 25d August; and it was this long delay which enabled England, the governor to erect those formidable interior retrenchments which proved so fatal to the Allies in the second assault. They came out in profusion, indeed, when they did come, but it was too late; the enemy had turned to too good purpose the prolonged delay thus afforded him (2). Men could not be more zealous than the British government were at this period in the prosecution of the contest, and none ever made such stupendous efforts to carry it on as they did in this year; but they were still insensible to the value of time in war, and bore, in their best combinations, too much of the character of their Saxon ancestors, of whom Athelstane the Unready is the true personification. So frequently has this ignorance of the simplest principles of military combination, on the part of government, marred the greatest efforts, or disconcerted the best-laid enterprizes of the British nation, that it deserves the serious consideration of all those who have the direction of the studies of youth, whether some instruction on the subject should not form part of elementary education to all those at least who are likely, from their station or prospects, to be called to the supreme direction of affairs.

Soult was not unmindful of his promise to attempt a serious diversion for the relief of the distressed garrison of St.-Sebastian. Before daylight on the army; but the maval force on this coast is too weak to give us any of the description I require, and for the want of which we shall now he so much dis-tressed. The soldiers are obliged to work in the transports, to unload the vessels, because on seamen can be furnished; and we have been obliged to use the barbour boats of Passages, navigated by nomen, is landing the ordonnee and stores, because there was no naval force to supply us with the assistance we should have required in hoats. If we had a sufficient naval force, we might, if the weather permitted, muke an attack from the sea at the same time that we should make the attack upon the lireaches from the walls. This would at all events divide the enemy's attention, and would probably prevent touch of the loss in the assault of the breaches, if it did not tend to ensure the success of the assault. If the navy of Great Britaio cannot afford more than one frigute and a few brigs and cutters, fit and used only to earry despatches, to cooperate with this array in the siege of a maritime place, the possession of which before the bad season comococes, is important to the army as well as the navy, I must be satisfied, and do the hest I can without such assistance."—Wellington to Lond BATHURST, 19th August 1813. Gurwood, xi. 1819.

⁽¹⁾ Joocs' Sieges, ii.(2) Wellington remonstrated again and again, in the roost energetic terros, against this locallies ble delay in forwarding supplies. "Your lordship will see by my report that we are still waiting for the hattering train, and we have thus lost sixteen days in the month of August, since I should have recewof the month of August, since I should have recewed the attack upon St. Schastian if I had had, the means This is a most important period in the catopaign, particularly for the attack of a place in the Bay of Biscay. How we are to attack Bayonne afterwards, I am sure I do not know. A British minister cannot too often have noder his view the element by which he is surrounded, and cannot make his preparations for the operations of a campaigo at too early a period."—Well retor to Lord Bythourst, 18th August 1813. Gurwooo, xi. 12.

"To the attack of a maritime place some assistance is usually received from the navy by the

50th August, he crossed the Bidassoa by the fords between the des-Soult's at tempt to troyed bridge on the great road and Andara, with Villate and ra se the s ege Reille's corps, mustering eighteen thousand combatants, while thausel, with twenty thousand men, was concentrated in the woods behind the Bayonette mountain, and Fuj, with seven thousand, was ready to support the attack Little ground required to be gained to raise the siege, for it was only eight miles from the point of passage, Oyarson, from whence the invading force might at once advance upon the rear of the besieging force Notwithstanding all the secreey of his preparations, however, Wellington recers ed intimation of his designs, and made his dispositions accordingly. Reinforcements to the amount of five thousand had arrived from England, including the brigade of guards which had just come up from Oporto, and the greater part of the stragglers from Vittoria had now rejoined their colours, so that the army was stronger than it had been before the battles in the Pyrences, but though he brought up the British troops to the close vicinity of the scene of action, so as to be ready to support their allies in case of any disaster, he wisely determined to make a trial of the Spaniards, in a strong position, to guard the entrance into their own territory With this view, be stationed the troops of that nation, composing the fourth army, about eighteen thousand strong, on the heights of San Marcial, on the southern side of the Bidassoa, already illustrated by a severe action between the Spiniards and French in the beginning of the revolutionary war (1) Longa's men were in reserve at a little distance in the rear, with the Portuguese of the fourth division, and the British brigades of the same division ready to support them Thus, nearly thirty thousand men in all niight be brought to stop the progress of the enemy, but the uncommon gallantry and stendiness of the Spanish troops, rendered all assistance needless, and left them the whole weight and glory of the fight (2)

Defined. Though Soult's troops were collected on me own, it was not the breach the Sist that the attack was made. At daylreak on that morning, Ake 31. Reflet's columns crossed by the fords above Britartu, and soon got footing on the opposite bank, where they made themselves masters, without much difficulty of a small battery, but when they came to ascend the opposite bill, which is there covered with brushwood, and is uncommonly steep, they full into disorder, and, before they could recover themselves, were charged by the Spaniards, who in firm atray descended upon them with such vigour, that they were driven headlong down. During this conflict, the French had succeeded in throwing a bridge across, under cover of some gime they had placed on the leights on their own side, about a mile further up, and Villatte's reserve advinced to the support of their defected romades. Encouraged by this assistance, Beille's men again advanced to the charge, and one brigade even succeeded in gaming the chipel of San Marcial on the summit at the left of the line, upon which Vellington ordered up the Kith.

troops, without waiting for the up a loud shout, and, rallying and refured to the charge, they were in great that come across, the Spaulards had

⁽³⁾ date in 158. (2) For v 321 305. Sop vi 201 225 licket. Sept 2 2813 (norm 16.6"

were defeated at both their points of attack with the loss each of some hundred men. Thus every thing seemed disastrons on the eastern coast, and, to complete the untoward state of affair, Lord William Bentinck had come alone from Sicily, fearing a descent from Hurst in that island, though after having entered into secret negotiations with the Allies, he soon after et out for Saxony, where, as already mentioned, he bore an important part in the buttle of Dresilen But the triumphs of the French were not of long duration On the 27th, intelligence was received of the battle of Vittoria, accompanied by orders, which were a necessary consequence of that event, for suchet entirely to evacuate Valencia, and retire behind the Ebro He immediately made preparations for abandoning the province, and left Valencia with a heavy heart, on the oth July, which was entered, four days after-July L. words, he Lord William bentinek, but, futbful to the positive July 9. instructions of Aspoleon to keep a tenacious grasp of all his conquests, he left twelve hundred men in Soguntum, five hundred in Torto-a-a fital error, the counterpart of the I mperor's obstinate retention of the fortresses on the Elbe and the Oder during the German campaign, and to which, more than any other cause, the little subsequent success of Suchet in the field is to be nscribed (1)

request. It was Suchet's first Intention, when he return because the first have marched upon Saragosa, and forming with the troop sloft level that in that province, to have united with Clausel, and, together, threatened that the result retrett of the latter tened the right flank of Wellington But the rapid retrest of the latter general from barazossa, by Jaca, into France, totally disconcerted this wellconceived project. The plain of tragon being entirely inundated with guerillas, while Wellington's mas es in farrire were on its flank, he felt it necessary to concentrate his forces in Catalours and on the Lower I tro, and, accordingly, gave orders for the exacuation of Saragossa and the fortresses of Aragon, the troops retiring to Vegumenza, Lerida, and Tortosa Pantinek followed with the Auglo-Siedun army; but it was soon found, however, I'v the little general, that though his forces were of considerable nun crical amount, yet they were not of such a composition as to enal le him to hazard offensive operations, without the utmost caution, beyond the I bro He hal, indeed, thirty thousand men nominally under his orders, but of these the Pritish and Germans, not quite ten thousand strong, could al me be relied I lio and Loche, with ten thousand more, were at Valencia in a very destitute condition, and the Duke del Parque, with twelve thousand, was several marches in the rear, and his troops, though paid by I mush sul o hee, were, from the inherent vice of procrastination common to all the Spanishis

r the news of the battle of lit-

. however, at this moment was tion, nourished by siip ples from the English feet off Pilermo, was riskly a rapid preares. Thus neither party were in a confition to in retake and operation of importance, and though suchet had sure-right if ower-left fire best trough of the empire at his command, they were so a attend over the numerous forthed posts and caucs which the Imperior I at ordered lies to garrison and maintain, that he we will be more than a match in the field of Registral, with his mother array of thrist thousand (2).

The exacuation of Aragin and Valer eta, like that of all the other places

⁽¹⁾ Ter & Think to the star of any for mater is 277 to be explicitly become 2000 to 41 the despite to be because the Comp of any 12 to the explicit to the explicit to the composition of the composition o mans, that it was with no small time and labour that the demolition was occupied by the British forces (1) coordinate Gradually after this the British army gained ground, and the French were cooped up into more contracted limits within the war-wasted province of Catalonia On the 5th September, the advance entered Villa Franca, and Suchet retired altogether into the Hobregal, leaving Tortosa, Lerida, and Mequinenza, non blockaded by the Spanish troops, to their own resources An event, however, erelong occurred, which showed that it was not without reason that Bentinek, with his heterogeneous array of troops, had intherto avoided a general engagement with the admirable veterans of Suchet On the 12th September, thelre hundred German and British infantry, with two British and two Sprinish guns, under Colonel Adam, and three battahons of Sarsfield's Catalonians, occupied, twelve miles in advance of Villa Franca, the position of Ordal, a ridge whieli rose gradually from a deep and impassable ravine, crossed by a noble bridge in front Suchet, hearing that this advanced guard, not more in all than three thousand men, was not adequately supported, concerred the design of cutting it off. For this purpose the divisions livrispe and liabert 1.11 were first assailed, but the men, who were lying beside their miskets in battle array, instantly started up and fought fiercely; and the Spaniarits, who were next attacked in the centre, made a most gallant resistance lla rispe's men, however, crossing the bridge in great numbers, soon turned the allhed flank, Adian was wounded early. Colonel Recres, who was second in command, was also soon struck down, and anulst all the confusion of a nocturnal combat, the troops, without any recognized levider [2], fought with great fors in detached bodies, but without any general plan. At length the Spaniards in the centre were broken, the 25th regiment turned and freed through, and the whole dispersed, four runs being taken. Captain Walliam, with eighty of the 27th, and Captain Muller, with the like number of Germans, effected their retreat by the hills, but all the rest were dispersed or the been induced it is the composing an advanced rise in the composing an advanced rise in the composing an advanced rise in the separate in the set of the composition of the compositi them with it eless of three the pass of fridit, who had two clays afternar's, but my to retire to the re-deack to family by White the campaign in the east of Spain was thus checkered with misfortunes, yet it had a most important effect on the issue of the campaign, and clearly demonstrated on what erroneous principles Napoléon's defensive system of retaining garrisons in so many fortresses was founded; for during a period when Soult was pressed by superior forces in the western Pyrenees, and France itself was menaced with invasion, sixty-eight thousand of the best soldiers of the French empire (1), were kept in check by ten thousand British and German troops, supported by twice that number of ill disciplined Spaniards; all pressure on Wellington's right flank from that formidable body was prevented, and the whole of Valencia and half of Catalonia resented from their grasp by a motley array, which could not for three days have kept the field in presence of his united forces (2).

^[1] Nap vi ld. Si. Ter r 3°5 321. Fooder, in. 283. Socket, in. 212, 215 No. 1, 2° 15 Year 334 335 (2. Evaluati 1 Utvial Account Garra Mi. 287

(1) Suchet, ii. 312, 315, Bentiuck's Official Account, Sept. 14, 1813, timew. Al. 147, 148, Nap. vii. 57, 59, Tor. v. 352, 333, Vict. et Conq. xxii, 303, 310.

(2) Detailed state of the Prench army in Spain, 16th September 1813.

Right Winz.

	Men.	Present un fer alous	l'ssective en l' Din ellective men.
Yoy,	5.002 4.166 5.707	. · · · · ·	B1X 114
	Center.	14,675
H'Armaguac,	4,338 5,903 4,812
		15,103
	Left Wing.
Conrad,	4.736
Rogard,	5.952
raupin,	5.071	15.759	45.767
	Resence.		14,757
Villatte	8,256
The Italian brigade, about 2,000, ordered	0,10		•
to Milan,	2,000
Provisional troups of the Right Wing, destined to reinforce the garrison of Bayonne,	2,168		12,424
·	Cavalry.		¥
Pierre Soult,	1,456	4,617
Triclhard, ditto,	2,365 291	2,583
- dismounted,	1,210
			8,325
_	Detached.	Men. Horses.
Parc,		895 885
Rugineers,	Garrisons.	505 127
Pampeluna		3,805 191
San Schastian, prisoners of war,		2,366
Santona,	• • •	1,633	·
		4,631 137 1,780
Navarens,		812
Castle of Lourdes,		107
		40.500
Deduct garrison of San Sebastian,		16,569 2,366
		1	14,203
Care I total amount under arms	•	•	$
Grand total present under arms	· · ·		80,719
35 - 0 1C - Cd 37 1 1		.

No. 1.—General State of the French Armies under Soult and Suchet, extracted from the Imperial Muster rolls, July 1813.

			Present under A	rnis.	Detac	hed.		Total.
Army of Spain,			97,983 12,	676	Mrn. 2,110	Horses.	Hospitals.	Men. 114,167	Horses, 13,028
Army of Arragon,			32,362 4.	,919 ,869	3,621	551	3,201	39,184	5.470
					168		1,374	27,457	1,774
Grand Total, .	•	•	156,255 19,	,464	5,899	943	18,654	180,808	20,242

Meanwhile, Wellington having completed his preparations, and which at received considerable reinforcements both from England and the hospitals, from whence the wounded men were discharged in such extraordinary numbers, and with such rapidity, under the in-not to the vade frames fluence of the mental excitement produced by continued and glorious success (1), as to excite the astonishment of the whole army, was taking measures for an invasion of France He was desirous, indeed, himself not to hazard that attempt at the present moment, for several reasons -l'amneluna, though again closely blockaded, and now severely distressed for provisions, had not set fallen , and till that event took place, not only could army, were fully forty thousand, and they had now acquired, from acting with the Anglo-Portuguese forces, a far superior degree of consistence and efficiency than they had ever before attained during the nar, but still there were many circumstances in their condition which rendered them likely to prove at least as dangerous as serviceable to an invading army, in spite of all the representations of Wellington, which had been as energetic as they were innumerable, the government at Cadiz, wholly engrossed with demoeratic ambition, had taken no efficient steps to provide for their armies, they were neither clothed nor paid, and in great part depended for their sul-istence upon the British rations, and there was too good reason to fear, that if they entered France they would rouse a national resistance, by the heense with which they retaliated upon its inhabitants the misery which their own countrymen had so long suffered at their hands. The Cortes, inflamed almost to madness by the meessant efforts of the republican press at Cadiz, who now dreaded nothing so much as the success of the affect arms, did all in their power to thwart the designs of Wellington for the common cause, the excesses at St -Schastian afforded too plausible a ground, which was amply taken advantage of, for inflaming the popular passions against the linglish general, they were represented as not the designless work of the unitabled soldiers, but a deliberate attempt of an heretical nation to destroy a mercantile community, of which they were jealous Wellington bluvelf was openly accused of aspiring to the crown of Spaln, and to such a height did the mutual recruminations rise, that he more than once offered to resign the supreme command, and, despatring of success with such lukewarm or treacherous allies, advised the British government to demand St -Schastian as a hostage (2), and if refused, to withdraw their forces altogether from the l'eninsula (5).

Ya 2-13-1 Squader 1112.

	Present ander Arms		Detailed			T 112
Army of Spain, Army of Arrague, Army of Catalogue	81.311 37 174 21,675	Home II 1 7 EAST IATO	1001	1111 1111 1111	22.175 3615 7137	11 11 11 11 11 11 11 11 11 11 11 11 11	# P P P P P P P P P P P P P P P P P P P

By desire of the British government he undertakes it. Although the British government were far from being insensible to the cogency of these arguments, yet they wisely determined to follow Wellington's advice, in cautiously abstaining from all interference with the Regency and Cortes at Cadiz, how criminal or absurd soever their conduct might be, and to bend all their efforts to the vigorous prosecution of the war; yet they were induced, by other considerations of a still higher importance, to urge their general to undertake the immediate invasion of the south of France. The coalition in Germany, they were well aware, was still very nearly matched by Napoléon; the disasters at Dresden had wellnigh dissolved his heterogeneous materials: and therefore so important an event as the invasion of France by the British forces, might be expected to produce a moral effect of the highest importance throughout Europe. Wellington, who at that period had little confidence in the stability of the Grand Alliance, and looked, not without reason, to the security of the Peninsula as the main object of his efforts, was desirous that his troops, or a principal part of them, should be turned against Suchet in Catalonia, in order that, during the absence of Napoléon with the greater part of his forces in Germany, the important strongholds in that province, an effectual barrier against France in the East, might be recovered to the Spanish monarchy. But the English government, looking to the general interests of Eu-

the enemy above a year; and the whole of Spain, excepting Catalonia and a small part of Aragon, since the months of May and June last. The most ahundant harvest has been reaped in all parts of the country; millions of money, spent by contending armies in the Peninsula, are circulating every where; and yet your armies, however weak in numbers, are literally starving. The Allied, British, and Portuguese army under my command, have been subsisted—particularly latterly—almost exclusively upon the magazines imported by sea; and I am concerned to infurm your Excellency that, hesides money for the pay of all the armies, which has been given from the military chest of the British army, and has been received from no other quarter, the British magazines have supplied quantities of provisions to all the Spanish armies, in order to enable them to remain in the field at all; and notwithstanding this assistance, I have had the mortification of seeing the Spanish troops un the outposts obliged to plunder the nut and apple trees for subsistence; and to know that the Spanish troops, employed in the blockade of Pampeluna and Santona, were starying upon half an allowance of bread, while the enemy whom they were clockading were, at the same time, receiving their full allowance.

"It cannot be pretended that the country does not produce the means of maintaining the number of men necessary for its defence; those means are undoubtedly superabundant; and the enemy has proved that armies can be maintained in Spain, at the expense of the Spanish nation, infinitely longer than are necessary for its defence.

"Sir, the fact is notorious, that there is no authority in the country to enforce the law and the due payment of the contributions tu government; and the officers of the llacienda do not perform their duty.

"They are infinitely more numerous than is necessary, and their maintenance exhausts the revenues which ought to be employed in the maintenance of the troops on the fruntiers. I have sent to your Excellency's office proofs that some luranches of the revenue cost 70 and 80 per cent to collect them.

"It must be obvious to your Excellency that matters cannot go on long as they are. The winter is approaching, and no magazines, or other provision of any kind, have been made for the Spanish tronps' who, as I have above stated, have not at present even enough for their daily subsistence."—Welliation to the Spanish Minister at War, 30th August 1813.

Giray oon, vol. xi. pp. 56, 58.

Our character is involved in a greater degree than we are aware of, in the democratical transactions of the Cortes, in the opinion of all moderate and well thinking Spaniards, and, I am afraid, with the rest of Europe; and if the mob of Cadiz hegin to move heads from shoulders, as the newspapers have threatened Castanos, and the assembly seize upon landed property to supply their necessities, I am afraid we must do something more than discountenance them.

"It is quite impnssible that such a system can last. What I regret is, that I am the person that maintains it. If I was ont of the way, there are plenty of generals who would overturn it. Ballasteros positively intended it; and I am much mistaken if O'Donnell, and even Castanos, and probably others, are not equally ready. If the King should return, he also will overturn the whole fabrie, if he bas any spirit; but things have gone so far, and the gentlemen of Cadiz are so completely masters of their trade of managing that assembly, that I am afraid there must be another convulsion; and I carnestly recommend to the British government to keep themselves clear of the democracy, and to interfere in nothing while the government is in their hands, excepting in carrying on the war, and keeping out the foreign enemy."—Wellington to Earl Baturusst, 5th Sept. 1813. Gunwood, vol, xi. p. 90, 91

"In consequence of the existing regency of Spain having departed from all the engagements entered into with me by the late regency after repruted personal discussions, and notwithstanding that I had received what I conceived was a confirmation of the engagements, and a declaration to adhere to them by the existing regency, I thought it proper, on the 30th August last, to resign the command of the Spanish armies, which resignation I have been informed, by a despatch from the Minister at War of the 22d of September, has been accepted by the regency, and I continue to exercise the command only till the new Cortes, shall have been assembled."—Wellington to Earl Barnusst, 5th October 18. Guryood, vol. xi. p. 164.

rope, and the probable effect of the measure on the determinations of the Alicel Sovereigns on the Elbe, decided otherwise; the invasion of France, oven before Pampeluna had fallen, was resolved on, and Wellington, like a good soldier, set limited to execute, to the best of his ability, an offensive campaign, which on military principles he deemed premature(1)

Beccupion Soult's position on the northern side of the Bidas-og consisted of Frish post the base of a trangle, of which Bayone was the apex, and the great distance to roads running from them tolrun on the sea-coast, and St Jean-Predde-Port in the interior, were the sides. The interior of this triangle was filled with a mass of rugged and in great part maccessible mountains, affording little means of subsistence to troops, and presenting ridges and passes at every step capable of arresting an invading army. The French army was stationed on the summit of the last ridge of this wild and rocky district, which immediately overlooked the valley of the Ridassoa, and various parts of it were strengthened with field-works, while the summit of the Rhune mountain, the highest part of the ridge terminating in a peak, surrounded on three sides by inaccessible precipices, and to be reached only from the eastward by a long narrow ridge on the top of the rocks, was crowned with a complete redoubt, All the hill roads which penetrated through this strong position, were commanded by works, the greater part of which were nearly completed, and the position, flanked by the sea on the one side, and the Blinne mountain, which, rising to the height of 2800 feet, and overlooking all the neighbouring lulls, on the other, could hardly be turned on either side Wellington, nevertheless, determined to hazard an attack, and he first intended to have made it in the middle of September, immediately after the eastle of $L-xcbastian fell; but the excessive storms of rain which afterwards came on, and swelled the Bidreson into a raging torrent, rendered it impossible to attempt the crossing of the fords till the beginning of October; and the state of the tides upon which the threading through them was mainly dependent, would not permit the passage being attempted till the 7th of that month Soult, not expecting that Weilington would attempt to force his strong positions in this quarter, had not allove fifteen thousand men immediately. In front of the ladasson; as in truth he did not regard the heights in front as the principal part of his position, but it was in the fortifications on the Nive In their rear, that the principal line of defence was constructed, by which he hoped to I revent the mission of the south of France. The French general had recently been joined by sixteen thousand new conscripts, who where distributed through the veteran corps of the army, so that his numerical force was little inferior to what it had been before the lattle of the Pyrenecs, I at it is accession of force was fully counterfulanced on the allied side by the arrival of three thousand fresh troops from England, and the approach of the Ar lafasian army of recerve under the Conde D'Abishal, fuffy twelve thousan I streez, which here an important part in the action which followed (2)

consideral le, and proportioned rather to the attack were very consideral le, and proportioned rather to the street afth of the erresults of the proportion of the erresults of the results of the result the state of the second second to the second second neral Alten with the light division, and Longa and Giron's Spaniards, were to cross the upper fords, and attack the Bayonette mountain and the Pass of Vera; while on the right the army of reserve of Andalusia, under the com mand of General Giron, was to attack the enemy's posts on the mountain of La Rhune, while the fourth and sixth divisions were in reserve to support them, if necessary. Altogether, the English general directed twenty-four thousand men against the Lower Bidassoa, and twenty thousand against the Rhune mountain and its adjacent ridges (1).

The night preceding the attack was unusually stormy and tempesment of the attack, and tuous. A thunder storm rolled down from the summit of the Rhune forcing of the French mountain, and broke with the utmost violence on the French positions on the Lower Bidassoa. During the darkness and storm, Wellington advanced a number of his guns up to the heights of San Mareial, while the troops and pontons were brought down, still unperceived, close to Irun, at the mouth of the Bidassoa; and the troops who were to cross over further up, were moved close to the respective points of passage, which were no less than ten in number, in order to be able simultaneously to commence the attack on the French position. All the tents of the allied army on the hills were left standing, and the pontons, which had been brought down to the water's edge, were carefully concealed from the enemy's view. At seven o'clock Lord Aylmer's brigade, which led the advance on the right, suddenly emerged from behind their screen, and advanced with a rapid pace towards the sands adjoining Irun, and immediately all the guns on the heights of San Marcial commenced their fire along the whole line; and so completely were the enemy taken by surprise, that Marshal Soult was passing troops in review in the centre of his position at the moment when the first guns were heard at the Lower Bidassoa. He immediately set out at the gallop in that direction; but before he could arrive in its vicinity, the positions had been carried, and the British were solidly established in the French territory. From the summit of San Marcial, seven columns could be seen descending rapidly from the heights, and advancing with beautiful precision and a rapid step towards the fords of the Bidassoa. Those on the upper parts of the stream descended at once into the enemy's fire; but those on the lower wound like huge snakes through the level sands, and were in some places almost immersed in water before they reached the firm ground on the opposite side. The surprise, however, was complete, and the enemy on the heights opposite made no very strenuous resistance. Several redoubts in the sand-hills were taken, and seven pieces of cannon captured. A much more obstinate resistance was made, however, at the mountain of Louis the Fourteenth, and the heights of the Croix des Bouquets, which was the key to the whole position in that quarter, and towards which both parties brought up their troops and guns with the greatest rapidity. The Germans, who first made the attack on this point, were repulsed with severe loss; but the 9th regiment, under Colonel Cameron; at this moment came up, and stormed the post with the utmost gallantry; the French falling back at all points, and in great confusion, on the high-road towards Bayonne; and it was only by the arrival of Soult at this moment, with the reserve and several guns, that order was in part restored (2).

While this rapid and important success was achieved on the left, Alten, with the light division, having forded the river, attacked the enemy's in-

⁽¹⁾ Wellington to Lord Bathurst, Oct. 9, 1813. Gurw. ai. 176. Murray's general orders in Wyld's Memoirs, 129, 130, 133.

The French trenchments in the Pass of Vera; and Giron, with the Andalusians, was led against the mountain of La lihune Taupin's division guarded from their position on the stupendous rocks in front of the Albes which were to be assailed, while the sixth division, under Cole, who were posted on the heights of St -Barbara, formed an imposing reserve, full in view of the French troops, and ready to co-operate at a mament's warning in the attack. The French troops in this quarter were posted on the summit of enormous rocky ridges, one of which, called by the soldiers the Boar's Back, projected, like a lines redoubt, far into the valley of Beira Ao sooner did Clausel, who commanded there, however, hear the first cannon shots on the Loner Bidasson, than he hurried four regiments up to the summit of the Great Rhune, and advanced with the remainder of his forces to the support of Taupin on the ridges beneath. But before he could arrive, the action in that quarter was decided Soon after seven o'clock, the Boar's Back was assailed at both ends, at its western extremity, that is, on the British right, by Giron's Andalusians, and on the left, towards the British centre, by Colonel Golborne, at the head of the 45d, the 95th, and 52d, and a Portuguese brigade of light troops Soon the slopes of the mountain were covered with men and fire, while the dark forests, at the bottom of the ravines, were filled with volumes of white smoke, that came curling up out of their immost recesses. The Portuguese Caradores were the first who made the attack, but they were overmatched by the French, who, rushing out of the redoubt at the summit, hurled them over the rocky slopes with great violence, but in the middle of their pursuit, the 52d regiment suddenly emerged from the wood, and startled the victorious f me sistue alt the french mas-- 1, 1 . pentered the re-· ' it attacked the se tuosity, and 400 prisoners were taken. Meanwhile Guron's Spannards, on the right, had also worked their way with great difficulty up the eastern end of the Boar's Boa

she

this extraordinary action. With astiduous eare, inc. i iene conamounth fortified their mountain positive in the Percence, it was sit it fell it an army as numerous, so far as the regular troops on either sit is were concerned, as those of the behind generals, and the heights on which is a French

⁽f. 1747 afrie 20 loof fin 2 week for 3 off2 found on 273 351 3520 fin 6 27 Cert at, 127 125 Nep at 275 378 Net on 3 -

were placed, far exceeded the far-famed steeps of Torres Vedras instrength and ruggedness. From this all but impregnable position they had been driven in a single day, by an enemy who, to reach it, had to ford a difficult and dangerous river, forming, as it were, a vast wet ditch to the intrenehment. Great as was the spirit evinced by the whole troops, Spanish as well as British or Portuguese, who had been engaged, it was not by their efforts alone that the battle was won. It was the combinations of the general, which rendered their attacks irresistible. It was the secreey of his preparations, and the suddenness of his onset, which carried the enemy's position on the Lower Bidassoa. It was the admirable combinations which threw an overwhelming force against the rocks in the centre, which won the dizzy heights of La Rhune. In defence of their rocky intrenehments, the French were far from displaying their wonted spirit and vigour; and, what is very remarkable, the same troops who had ascended with so intrepid a step the crags of Sauroren, now abandoned with little resistance the loftier rocks of the Bayonnette—a remarkable proof of the old observation, that the French are much better adapted for offensive than defensive warfare, and how much the eourage of the bravest troops may be lowered by a long series of defeats. In this battle the Allies lost about 4600 men, of whom one half were Spaniards. The French were weakened by not more than 1400, their troops during the greater part of the fighting being proteeted by the intrenchment which they defended. But this was of little eonsequence. The enemy's intrenched position, upon which they had so long laboured, had been lost: the territory of the great nation was violated; and a vast hostile army, for the first time since the Revolution, permanently encamped within the territory of France. And thus was England, which throughout the contest had been the most persevering and resolute of all the opponents of the Revolution, and whose government had never yet either yielded to the vietories or acknowledged the chiefs of the Revolution, the first of all the forces of Europe who succeeded in planting its victorious standards on the soil of France (1).

The first eare of Wellington, after the army was established within ton's noble and humane the French territory, was to use the most vigorous measures to prevent plundering on the part of his troops, and to establish that admirable system of paying regularly for the supplies of the army, which, as much as the bravery of the British soldiers, had contributed to his previous successes. The better to effect these objects, he issued a noble proelamation to his troops, in which, after recounting the incalculable miseries which the exactions of the French soldiers had brought upon Spain and Portugal, he declared that it would be unworthy of a great nation to retaliate these miseries upon the innocent inhabitants of France, and therefore that plundering and every species of excess would be rigorously punished, and supplies of every kind paid for with the same regularity as they had been in the Peninsular kingdoms (2). Neither the Spanish troops nor the French

⁽¹⁾ Nap. vi. 268, 269. Wellington to Lord Bathurst, 9th Oct. 1813. Gurw. xi. 179.

(2) "The officers and soldiers of the army must recollect that their nations are at war with France, solely because the ruler of the French nation will not allow them to be at peace, and is desirons of foreing them to submit to his yoke; and they must not forget that the worst of exils suffered by the enemy, in his profligate invasion of Spain and Portugal, have been occasioned by the irregularities of the soldiers, and their cruckties, authorized and encouraged by their chiefs, towards the unfortunate and peaceful inhabitants of the country.

[&]quot; To revenge this conduct on the peaceful inlinbitams of France would be nomanly, and unworthy of the nations to whom the commander of the forces now addresses himself; and, at all events, would be the occasion of similar and worse evils to the army at large, than those which the enemy's army live suffered in the Peninsula, and would eventually prove highly injurious to the public interests

[&]quot;The rules, therefore, which have been observed hitherto in requiring, and taking, and giving re-ceipts for supplies from the country, are to be continued in the villages on the French frontier; and the Commissioners attached to each of the armics of peasantry at first gave any credit to this proclamation, so utterly at variance was it with the system by which the former had been accustomed to suffer. and the latter to profit, during the Peninsular campaigns. But Wellington was at once serious in his intention and resolute in his determination, and he soon gave convincing proof of both by instantaneously hanging several soldiers, both British and Spanish, who were detected in the act of plundering; at the same time, the perfect regularity with which supplies of all kinds were paid for with ready money in the English camp, anakened the covetous feelings of the French mountaineers, who hastened to profit by the prolific stream of war, which, fortimately for them, had entered their valleys; meanwhile, fourteen French peasants, who had been taken near the pass of Lehalfir firing on the British troops, were conducted to Passages as pri oners of war, where they were embarked for the British islands. The effect of this stroke was incalculable, for the peasants could not deny its justice, or accuse the Pritish general of harshress when treating them as prisoners of war, while at the same time the idea of being carried to England, appeared like an exile to the world's end to these simple mountaineers. Thus, impelled by am on the other, the rea-, and the English dillars mountains, which all the rizonr of the French requisitions had been unable to discover (1)

n reented by the What rendered the impression of this conduct the greater upon the I cench peasantry, was the nule contrast which the conduct of their enemies thus presented to that which was at the same time pursued by their own defenders in the French army The revolutionary generals, now for the first time thrown back upon the territory of I ruce, had tio means which the government of l'aris would sanction, for the subsistence, clothing, and often pay of the troops, but by firee I requisitions on the countries in which they were contoned. This system illd adialral ly well, and was in the lighest degree popular in France, as long as the requisitions fell on foreign countries, but the esse was very different non when thes were driven linek into their own territory, and these oppressive I unlens ha I to be borne by themselves. Their eves were suildenly opened with appalling effect to the injustice which they so long practised upon others. When the whole arrondissements around Basonne accordingly were laid under contribution fuelag noneenth 11

trasting these enormous revolutionary burdens with the comparatively light weight of the old Corners, which had been so much complained of left refree threohoros. Soult, infeed, did his timout to prevent plandering, and even executed an officer and some soldiers who had been detected pilizaing some houses in Sarre, inmediately after the action. In this was not the exit dat was considered of it was the forced requisitions, in other words, the extra

Promoter P 12

the several prices mily recent the order from the Lecturarder, smaller for the arms of the

⁽⁾ if wight has a manifold mean a graph that he had a manifold mean a graph that he had the high a large had the had t profes on paid with notice without partie from a taking of a North rayant. The large, Amount of Kalakin and Agraelium, who has parties remained from the control of the state of the state nized rapine of government, that was the real evil that was so sorely felt. And thus, while the English army spread wealth and prosperity around its eantonments, the presence of the French was known only by the oppressive weight of the military exactions by which they were maintained; and such was the magnitude of these burdens, and the exasperation which they excited among the peasantry of the country, that Soult's principal commissary, Pellot, has not hesitated to ascribe chiefly to that cause the general indisposition manifested by the rural population of France, during the invasion of 1814, to support the cause of Napoléon (1).

Distress and When Wellington found himself once established in the territory capitulation of France, he immediately began strengthening his position with field-works, facing towards the north, in order to be the better able to resist any attacks Soult might make to expel him from the French soil. He waited only the surrender of Pampeluna to resume offensive operations; but such had been the activity which the governor had displayed in replenishing his magazines during the short interruption of the blockade by the battle of Sauroren, that it was not till two additional months had expired that his resources were exhausted. The garrison had confidently expected to be delivered on the 25th of July, and gazed with silent rapture on the mountains of Zubiri and Esteribar, which reflected at night the glow of the French bivouacs; but these hopes gradually died away as the fire receded on the day following, and their aching eyes beheld no friendly columns surmounting the nearest ridges of the Pyrenees; and on the 50th, the blockading forces resumed their old position, and the blockade became more strict than ever. Early in August, the Gallicians, about nine thousand strong, replaced O'Donnell's Andalusians in the blockade; while Mina, with ten thousand more, lay in the defiles of the Pyrenees to intercept the garrison, in case they should escape the vigilance of the troops around the town. With such vigilance, however, was the blockade conducted, that during the three months it lasted the garrison never once received even a letter from their comrades. In the middle of October, the governor, who had conducted the defence with the most persevering constancy, put his troops on scanty rations of horse flesh; and on the 26th, his resources being now exhausted, and the garrison subsisting only on the most revolting reptiles and unwholesome plants which grew on the ramparts (2), negotiations were entered into for a surrender. Gassan, the governor, at first proposed to capitulate, on condition of being allowed to retire into France with six pieces of cannon; but this was positively refused, as Wellington's instructions were peremptory that the garrison must surrender at discretion. Upon this refusal, hostilities were resumed, and the governor undermined some of the bastions, threatening to blow them up, and cut his way sword in hand to France, as Brennier had done at Almeida three years before. But three days more of hunger so tamed the spirit and reduced the strength of the garrison, that they were unequal to such an effort: Wellington's orders were positive, if such an attempt were made, to ments subjected to requisitions so impatient of the government of Napoleon; the people incessantly prurounced with loud groans the words requisition and covec.—Plilor, Commissaire-General de Guerre dans les Pyrenées, en 1813, p. 39.

(2) Dogs and cats were esteemed a luxury; rats and mice had long been sought out with avidity; and several soldiers had died from eating the roots of hemlock which grew on the ramparts .- Belwas, iv. 771.

⁽¹⁾ Pellot, 39, 42, 79.
The system of forced requisitions conceals, under the appearance of a just division of the burdens of war, an inexhaustible source of abuses. It weighs exclusively on the tural proprietors, while the e-pitalest, who has no productions, escapes it altogether. This system, born of the Revolution, applicable, perhaps, under a popular government, exasperates the mind under the rule of a single mountch. I do not hesitate to say that it is one of the causes which has chiefly contributed to render the depart-

give no quarter to the governor or officers, and to decimate the garrison Fortunately for the honour of England, and the fame of her chief, it was not necessary to have recourse to such extremities, which, in the case of the soldiers and inferior officers at least, would have been of very doubtful legality on the 51st, the garrison surrendered at discretion, to the number of three thousand, including eight hundred sick and wounded, and were made prisoners of war (1)

Soult . de Santona now was the only fortress which remained to the French period in the north west of Spain, and though Lord Aylmer, with his galof fore go operations. lant brigade, was ordered to embark at Passages to aid in the reduction of that place, yet circumstances prevented the design being carried into effect, and it continued blockaded to the end of the war Meantime Soult was at first anxious to abandon the bues in front of Bayonne, and proposed to debouche by Jaca with fifty thousand men into Aragon, unite with Suchet, who, he thought, might join him with thirty thousand more and a hundred pieces of cannon, and with their combined forces again Invade Sprin, maintuning the war on the resources of that country, instead of the now exhansted provinces of the south of I rance But this project, which afforded by far the most feasible plan for averting from the imperial ilominious the horrors of invasion, was rendered abortive by the obstinacy of Napoleon, in insisting upon the retention of so many fortres-es in Catalonia by Suchet, which so reduced his effective force in the field, that, after providing a body men and a hundred guns, to co-operate with him in driving the Miles over that river, but only on condition that he got the artiller; men and draught horces of Soult's army sent to Catalonia, his own being also held in the for-tresses, which was out of the question, as it would have entirely paralysed Soult limiself, and, moreouse, he declared that he must, in conformity with the Emperor's instructions, return, as soon as the English were driven across the Fro, to his principal duty, that of watching over the fortresses in Catalonia (2). Thus, thus project of joint operations came to nothing, and mean-

(1) Belin, ir 116 719 Jones Seges i S 18

at from the property like recovery to concept with the formation of the property lips in the first property lips in the left property lips in the li

French territors. By that a roke everything was changed and offices on a rate and been reached and offices on a rate and been reached by the first of the first of the reached and the first of the reached to make an office tool in rich upon the Loren The so in first the same time the reached to make an office tool in rich upon the Loren The so in first at our new reached and published to the same time the reached and the Lappace to most first the too the same time to be a support to the reached and the same time to be a support of the reached and the same time to be a support of the reached and the same adoption are noted in page one of first and the substitute of the same adoption are noted and page on a find a real first and the same adoption are noted and page on a find a real first and the same adoption are noted and page on a find and the while Wellington's passage of the Bidassoa and invasion of France rendered all idea of offensive hostilities in the Peninsula out of the question, and fixed the theatre of war permanently in the south of France; a striking proof of the wisdom of the British government in urging, against Wellington's opinion, that bold undertaking (1).

Soult made good use of the month's respite afforded him by the of Soult's prolonged resistance of the garrison of Pampeluna, to strengthen to the Nivelle. a most extraordinary degree his position on the Nivelle. It consisted of three lines of defence, one behind another, which equalled those of Torres Vedras in strength and solidity. They ran along a line of hills forming the northern boundary, for the most part, of the valley of the Nivelle, and stretched from the sea and St.-Jean de Luz on the right, to Mount Daren on the left: from thence to St.-Jean Pied-de-Port, the line was protected by a ridge of rocks, so ragged that neither army could pretend to cross them. Numerous field-works constructed on every eminence, especially on the right, where the great road to St.-Jean de Luz and Bayonne crossed the ridge, protected the line in every part where it appeared to be not adequately seemed by the obstacles of nature. A second line in rear of the former ran from St.-Jean de Luz on the right to Cambo on the left, and embraced the camps of Espelette and Suraide, and the camp of Sarre, the principal points where the enemy's forces were assembled. A third line was established behind Santa Pe, on the road to Ustaritz; but the redoubts on it were only commenced. Those on the two former were completed, and armed with heavy guns drawn from the arsenal of Bayonne. Soult having been reinforced by sixteen thonsand conscripts, had eighty thousand effective combatants under his orders, of whom seventy thousand were in the field, and could be relied on for active operations. The right, near St.-Jean de Luz, under Reille, consisted of three divisions of infantry: Clausel in the centre guarded the redoubts behind Sarre with three divisions; the left, under d'Erlon, of two divisions, was behind d'Ainhoa. Foy, with his division, was on the extreme left, between St.-Jean Pied-de-Port and Bidarray, to threaten the allied right, and act as circumstances might require (2).

Welling-ton's plan of The heavy rains usual in the end of autumn having fallen, and fine weather returned, Wellington, on the 9th November, prepared for a general attack. After carefully surveying the enemy's position, Wellington judged that it was weakest in the centre, in the opening between the Rhune mountains and the bridge of Amotz, over the Nivelle, and it was there accordingly that he resolved to make his principal effort. His plan of attack was thus arranged. Hill, with the right wing, consisting of the second and sixth divisions, under Stewart and Clinton, Murillo's Spaniards, and two Portuguese brigades, was to assail the enemy's left, behind D'Ainhoa. The right centre, under Beresford, consisting of the third, fourth, and seventh divisions, under the command of Generals Colville, Le Cor, and Cole, was to direct their attack against the redoubts in front of Sarre and the heights behind it, supported on the left centre by Giron's Spaniards, who were to attack the slopes situated to the westward of Sarre. General Alten, with the light division and Longa's Spaniards, was in the first instance to attack the heights of La Petite Rhune, which the enemy still held as an advanced re-which the Emperor felt to give up any of the great fortresses his arms had conquered, which necessarily deprived Suchet of the means of carrying it into execution, and was part of the same system which caused him to lose such noble armies in the garrisons on the Elbe, the Oder, and the Vistula.

⁽¹⁾ See Belm. i. 267. Soult to Due de Feltre, Oct. 1813. Ibid. 693. Suchet, ii. 348, and App. 454, et Subseq.

Subseq.
(2) Vict. et Conq. xxii. 286, 287. Pellot, 70, 71.
Nap. vi. 332, 333. Tor. v. 370.

doubt in front of the middle of his line, and having carried them, co-operate in the general attack on the centre, while Sir John llope, who had succeeded Grabam in the command of the left wing, consisting of Freye's Spaniards, was to engage the enemy's attention by a fearned attack on their right, near the sea, on the hills in front offst -feanded.inz Thus hill and Herceford's corps, forming a mass of forty thousand admirable infantry, of whom above the lithy librors and were British and Portiguese, were to be thrown on the weakest part of the enemy's hierarchic the centre, near the bridge of Anortz, between Clausel's and d'I'rlon's corps. It will be seen from these directions how many of Ingland's less generals, Proton, Balloniese, Lesth, Osnald, and others, were absent from ill health, or other univoidable causes, but, on the other hand, the post assigned to the Spaniards in the fight, told how censibly their discipline and efficied hid improved under Wellington's directions in the course of the examinar (1).

note of the The action began at day light by an assault on the enemy's fortified storming of outworks on the lesser Ithune, which was so far in advance of their the Per te main line that it required to be carried before the general attack could commence This fort, perched on a craggy summit, surrounded on three sides by precipices two limited feet high, was accessible only on the east by a long parrow ridge, which in that direction descended towards Sarre, in the valley of the Aircile The troops destined for this operation, consisting of the light division under Alten on the left, and Giron's Andalusians on the right, had been formed, concerled from the enemy, as near as possible to their respective points of attack on the evening of the 9th, and at the signal, on the following morning, of three guns from the lofty summit of Melinbia, they sprang up, the level rays of the sun glauced on ten thousand bayonets, and immediately the shagey sides of the Petite libune rang with the thunder of cannon, and was enveloped in smoke. The I rench heed fast from the summilt of their inaccessible chiffs; but the 15d, which headed the attack of the light division, pressed bolilly upward, and the first redoubt was soon carried From Hience to the second was an ascental most precipitons, to be surmounted only by marrow paths, which amids the steep crags wound up to the sumnift There a desperate conflict, bayonet against bayonet, man against man, ensued, but the enthusiastic valour of the I'd overcome every opposition, and the fort was won Upon this, the I reach retreated to their last stronghold, at the summet of the Petite Illiune, called the Donjon, but here the Impetuous assault of the 15d was staved by a natural ditch or eleft in the rocks fifteen feet deep Soon, honever, the Portuguese Cagadores came to their ail, the 52d threatened them on the other side, and the outer works were alan I med Upon this, the fixl with a loud short leaped down into the riefts in a minute, the old walls were scaled, and the Pritish colours planted on the highest surmit of the eastle. At the same time, kempt, though sorely wounded, kept the field, and expelled the enemy from the clevated plateau from which la Punte Illiune arose, and the French, driven out of all their a leanced posttions, fell back in great confusion to their main line of defence behind Ascain, leaving a lattation which was made prisoners at the summit of the tracks taut (2).

Formula:

While the rocky surmits of the lesser libure were it is wrested to state from the enemy, the fourth and seventh days each of the rule of the stream of shot upward into the works, that the garrison, upon seeing the troops advancing with the scaling ladders, leaped down from their intrenchments and fled. Far on the right, Hill, after a long and difficult night's march, had got, a little before seven, to the front of the enemy's extreme left, and after driving them from their rugged positions immediately opposite, near Urdax, inclined upwards, and with the aid of the sixth division soon approached the broken ground where D'Erlon's redoubts were placed, near the bridge of Amotz. To the spectator on the Petite Rhune, which overlooked the whole of this complicated hattle field, it presented a scene of unrqualled grandeur. Far to the right, Hope's Spaniards were coming into action, and a hundred guns below, answered hy as many on the summits of the rocks, made a deafening roar in the lesser hills near the sea; while in the centre and right, lifty thousand men, rushing like an impetuous torrent down the slopes of the Atchubia mountain, with lond shouts chased the receding French divisions into the lower grounds near the Nivelle (1).

The enemy's troops, retreating at various points at the same time through broken ground, and having their line of defence nierced through in many places, were in no condition to resist this terrible ouset, and gave way in a manner that proved that long-continued disaster had weakened their spirit. Clausel's divisions in the centre, in particular, yielded in a manner which called forth the severe animadversions of that general and Marshal Soult (2). Clinton, with the sixth division, broke through all the works gnarded by D'Erlon's men, which covered the approaches to the bridge of Amotz, and then wheeling to the right, attacked and carried in the most gallant style the enemy's redoubts behind Ainhoa, so as entirely to turn their defences in that quarter. The Portuguese division and Byng's hrigade, with equal vigour, stormed the redoubts to which they were opposed in front of D'Ainhoa; and the French of D'Armagnae's division, finding that their line of defence was entirely broken through, set fire to their huts, and retreated behind Santa Pe, nearly two leagues to the rear. The rough nature of the ground caused the French left to fall into confusion while executing this retrograde movement: and Abbe's division, which stood next on the line, was entirely uncovered on its flank, and exposed to the most imminent danger. That brave general, however, stood firm, and for a short time arrested the flood of conquest; but D'Erlon, seeing his danger, at length ordered him to retreat. Couroux's division, which extended from Sarre to Amotz, was at the same time broken through at several points by the third and sixth divisions, and their gallant commander mortally wounded. Though occasionally arrested by the formidable redoubts which lay in their way, the flood of war did not the less roll impetuously on, until these isolated landmarks, cut off from each other, were overwhelmed, as a stream tide breaking on rock-hestrewed shores, rushes round the black masses which obstruct its rise, till surrounded by the foaming surge, they are finally submerged (3).

Rout of the French right centre, consisting of Taupin's division and a large body of conscripts, still and completion of the victory.

Clausel's right wing, however, forming the French right centre, still and completion of the victory.

⁽¹⁾ Nap vi. 342, 343. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 267, 268. Wellington to Lord Bathurst, Oct. 13, 1813. Gurw. xi. 281, 282. Tor. v. 372, 373.

^{(2) &}quot;General Clausel was the first to declare with regret, that the divisions under his orders had not in all cases done their duty. If they had fought with the ardour which they had evinced in previous combats, and subsequently showed, the enemy, in spite of his superiority of number, would not have forced our lines without a loss of 15,000 or 20,000 men."—Printer Course des Prefinite 72.

men."—Pellot, Guerre des Pyrénées, 73.
(3) Viet. et Conq. xxii 288, 289. Nap. vi. 342, 345. Pellot, 72, 73. Wellington to Lord Bathurst, Nov. 13, 1813. Gurw. xi. 282, 283.

of rallying the fugitives, and still retrieving the day. But at this critical juncture the light division, which had won the Petite Rhune, pressing forward with inabated vigour, led by the gullant 52d, attacked Taupin's front, and

British division quickly assailed them in front and flank, and they were put to the rout The signal-post redoubt, the strongest in the whole French line, saturated on a high hill in the centre, was now left to its fate, and Colborne, at the head of the 32d, advanced to storm it, but two attacks were repul ed with heavy loss, though on the third, the garrison, seeing them-elves entirely ent off and surrounded, surrendered at discretion. During this rout of the right centre, Clausel's divisions fled through the Arvelle in great disorder, and Soult, in extreme alarm, hurried from St -Jean-de-Luz, with all his reserves, to endeavour to arrest the progress of defeat Wellington, upon seeing the force which was thus ready to be thrown upon the flank of his rictorious centre when hurrying on in the tumult of success, wisely hilted the fourth and seventh divisions, and toron's Spaniards, upon the northern slope of the heights they had won, looking down upon the enemy's camp at barres No sooner, however, had the sixth division, which was in reserve, come up, than the pursuit was renewed, the whole british centre crossed the Airelle, dray o the enemy from the heights beyond it, which formed his second line of defence, and established themselves on that advantageous ground, about two leagues in advance of the position occupied by them In the morning I pon this the enemy's right, under Reille, which had been engaged all day with Freyre's Spaniards, felt back also, and St Jean de-Inz and Ascam were evacuated, and the whole had of the Auctle, with its superb positions and six miles of intrenchments, fell into the hands of the Allies (1)

The breeth Next morning the victors advanced in order of battle at all points llope, with the left, furded the Arvelle above l'idart, I cresford, with the centre, moved direct upon Arbonne, and Hill, with the right, occupied I spelete and Suraide, and approached Cambri During the battle on the preceding day, I or, who with his iters on was in front of the Pierto de Mayas, had gained some success against Mina and Murillo's Spaniards, to whom he was opposed, and captured a consideral le part of their baggage, but the defeat of the main army oblige I film ales to fall back, and he effecte I his retreat, not without thill cults, by (anobo an I Littritz, on the following day Soult had now rathed his arms in his thir l line of intrenchments, about eight miles in rear of the first, but the tre if were too dispirated, and the works in too unfinished a state to il ank of defending them, wherefore, abandoning that line also altogether, I e retired Into the Intrenched camp he had constructed in front of Caronne, leaving the whole intermediate country in the hands of the Allies In this I attle Mellington lost 2: 14 men, but the loss of the French was 42 5, Inclifing 1100 prisoners. They alundoned tifty-one pleces of carnon, an fall their fe' ! magazines, and, what was of more in portance, the great ro intain larrer, on which il ev had been lat it ring assi ht usly for three morths, was broken through and cutture I, the When were firmly established in the breech treritory, will the harbour of St -Jean de I us to bring out I' es af all sorts fats the heart of their cantonments, and if e flames of war I : 11 een seen f " let

⁽¹⁾ Staff wing to End E Anni Sic 13 1113 Give 11 Pr. 257 Sic 10.31 3.1 Top of 313 National Control Signature

upon the summit of their mountain screen, far and wide through the plains and valleys of France (1). Though Wellington, however, had thus driven the French from their position, and gained very considerable extension for the canto repress among his troops.

tonments of his troops, yet his situation was far from being free from anxiety and even peril. He was uneasy for his right flank as long as Soult held, which he still did, the tête-de-pont over the Nive, at Rothsay; and, in consequence, Hill received orders to menace it on the 16th. This was accordingly done, and at his approach the French retired across the river and blew up the bridge, which effectually secured his right flank. But the disorders of the Spanish and Portuguese soldiers in the Spanish villages, as well as the pillaging of the British, was a more serious and durable subject of auxiety. With the latter, plunder was the result merely of the passing desire of gain and intoxication; but with the former it was a deeper feeling, for it was founded on a profound thirst for vengeance, arising from the innumerable evils of a similar description which the French troops had inflicted upon every part of the Peninsula. There was hardly a soldier in the Spanish or Portuguese armies who could not tell the tale of a parent or brother murdered, a sister or daughter ravished, or a patrimony destroyed, from the violence of the French soldiers, or the more lasting scourge of their contributions; and they not unnaturally imagined, that now that they had got into France, it was their turn to indulge in the same excesses, and satiate at once their thirst for vengeance and desire for plunder, on the blood and the property of the wretched inhabitants (2). Plundering, accordingly, immediately began. On the very day of the battle, Freyre's and Longa's soldiers began pillaging Ascain the moment that they entered it, and murdered several of the inhabitants; Mina's battalions on the right, some of which had shaken off all authority, dispersed themselves, marauding through the mountains; and the Portuguese and British soldiers of the left had begun the same disorders, and two persons had been killed in one small town. Natural as the feelings were which led to these excesses on the part of the Peninsular soldiers, they were utterly abhorrent to the disposition of Wellington—they were subversive of the principles on which he had throughout maintained the contest, and were only the more dangerous that they arose from such deeply moved passions of the human heart. Immediate and decisive, accordingly, were the measures which he adopted to remedy the evil. On the 12th, though in hourly expectation of a battle, he put to death all the Spanish marauders he could take in the act; and as the Peninsula generals were tardy or reluctant in carrying his orders into execution, and even remonstrated against them, he at once sent the whole Spaniards, except Murillo's division, which had conducted itself properly, out of France; obliging Freyre's Gallicians to retire into Biscay, Giron's Andalusians into the valley of Bastan, and Longa's men over the Ebro; while Mina's mutinous battalions were disarmed and sent across the Pyrenees. By these vigorous measures, he wound up to a pitch of frenzy,—'They murdered my father,' said he; 'they cut my mother's throat, and they ravished my sister before my eyes; and I vowed at the time I would put to death the first French family that fell into my hands;—you may hang me if you will, but I have kept my oath, and care not for dying.' He was hanged, however: indeed, no fewer than eighteen were suspended, on this and the following days, to the branches of trees. Such extreme measures were requisite to check the ordent thirst for vengeance in the Penin. check the ordent thirst for vengeance in the Peninsular soldiers."-Subaltein, 146.

⁽¹⁾ Wellington to Lord Bathurst, Nov. 13, 1813. Gurw. M. 284, Belm. i. 268. Vict. et Conq. Mii. 290, 291. Pellot, 53, 74. Nap, vi. 352, 353.
(2) "We ran up and found a poor old French peasant lying dead at the bottom of the garden. A bullet had passed through his head, and his thin grey hairs were dyed with his own blood. A Caçadore rushed out and attempted to clude us. On entering, we saw an old woman, the wife of the peasant, lying dead in the kitchen. The desperate peasant, lying dead in the kitchen. The desperate Portuguese did not attempt to deny having perpetrated these murders : he seemed on the contrary deprived himself, at a period when he much required it, of the aid of twenty-five thousand now experienced troops; but the effect was decoure:—

it marked the lofty character of the man who would rather arrest succes, even at its flood tide, than purchase it by infigurt, it restored his authority in the army, and at once checked its excesses; and, by dissipiting the fears of the French peasantry, brought them back to their homes, where, finding the strictest discipline established, and every thing paid for in ready money, an anicable intercourse was immediately established between them and the invaders (1).

But although the disorders with which he was immediately surrounded were effectually checked by these energetic steps, it was not so easy a matter for the English general to make headagamst the dangers which were accumulating in his rear, and which threatened to snatch the frints of victory from his grasp at the very time when they were within his reach. The democratic povernment at Cadiz, actuated by the furious passions and instable ambition which could not fail to be engendered by vesting the supreme power in an assembly elected by the universal suffrage of an old community, was indefined to the state of the country of the co in his way, and excite the rational would have blown the fitme that only by the unbroken screen first cause their total state of destitution rendered pullage almost unavoldable; and immediately after he had borne the British standards in triumph across the Pyrences, he was so thwarted in all his designs by the democratic leaders at Galiz, that he actually resigned the general command of their armos, and recommended to the British government entirely in withdraw their army from the Peninsula if their demands were not acceded to (2). Nor were his difficulties less fortindable at Liston, where the ample British subsidy was so dissipated by official corruption, that not one hall of it reached the proper destination; the muleteers of the army were two years, the solliers nine months in arrear of their pay, the mazzaines empty; the stores destent; although the subsidy was amply sufficient to have kept all these verifies in plentiful circumstances. Fortunitely the Spanish authorities had still sufficient recollection of their defeat to appreciate the rouseunces of bons left.

(1) Welliegton to Lord Estharts, Nov. 27, 1813. Gure in 223 Nop. vl. 325. Well ugtun to Sevyer. Nov. 18. 1818. Guren, 31. 227. 288. Resenhaup. Guerre de 1811. H. 31, 52.

(2) "It is quote even to me, that if we'de not less down the despector at fact, the name is local, book that is to be down, but haven ""Worstunes to be it Wage eve, 16th the 1823-leave 2 200

All the properties the 1 tells age on the Reinly argued in Syn on a reset the proping of the smoothy has the first and of preventions who would be the proping of the smoothy has the smoothy and the state of the st

getwo far, you will fost table how 20 the Advantages which you me (a tayper from the services) gas have produced them. I because the you is trace, plan are said; of the model in fig. to trace, the plan are said; of the model in fig. the concept of the plan are the product for the A. In terms at their own extent expend on the A. In terms at their own extent expend on that if they held and how in give model to you will be a said to be a second of the product of the plan and the plan are the product of the plan and the plan are the plan and destend any series (g) be the saiding of the A set; frames, a plant the present of some of a first present of the protured of the present of the said of the plan and the plan are considered to the plan and the plan and the plan are the said of the the transparent with the plan and the plan are the plan and the plant and the plant are the plan and the plan and the plan particular plannament when the first of the transparent of plantage of the said and the plan and the plan particular plantage of the said and the plan and the plantage of the plantage of the plantage of the plantage of the said of the plantage to their own resources; the resignation of Wellington was not accepted; the stern measure of sending back the maranders to Spain, restored discipline to the Peninsular armies; and Wellington was again enabled, with undiminished force, to renew the career of victory in the south of France (1).

While Wellington was thus experiencing, in the rancour and jealousies which were accumulating in his rear in the Peninsula. which he had delivered, the baseness of factious opposition, and the usual ingratitude of men to those from whom they have received inestimable services, he was preparing to follow up his successes over Marshal Soult, and confound his democratic calumniators at Cadiz by fresh obligations. His vast army, eighty thousand strong even after the Spaniards were withdrawn, and powerful artillery and cavalry—the former numbering a hundred pieces, and the latter eight thousand six hundred sabres-were restrained in the contracted space which they occupied, and he was auxions to extend his cantonments, and gain possession of more fertile districts. by forcing the passage of the Nive, and throwing the enemy entirely back under the cannon of Bayonne; but the heavy and long-continued winter rains, which in the deep clay of Bearn rendered the roads knee-deep, and wholly impassable for artillery or chariots, prevented him from undertaking any offensive operations till the end of the first week in Decenber. At that period. however, the weather cleared up, and the Nive having become fordable, he brought up fifty pieces of cannon, and the passage of the river was attempted; an effort which led to one of the most desperate and sanguinary actions of the war (2).

Soult's situation on the Nive, though strong, was full of difficulposition in ties. Bayonne, situated at the confluence of that river and the Bayonne, Adour, commanded the passage of both; and though a weak fortress of the third order, it had now, from its situation, and the intrenched camp of which it formed a part, become a point of first rate importance. The camp, being commanded by the guns of the fortress immediately in its rear, could not be attacked in front, on which account the French general stationed only his centre there, composed of six divisions under D'Erlon. The right wing, consisting of Reille's two divisions and Villatte's reserve, was stationed to the westward of the fortress on the lower Adonr, where there was a flotilla of gun-boats; and the approach to it was covered by a swamp and artificial inundation. The left under Clausel, posted to the westward of Bayonne, stretched from its right to the Nive, and was protected partly by an inundation, and partly by a large fortified house, which had been converted into an advanced work. The country in front consisted of a deep clay, much enclosed and intersected by woods and hedgerows, and four divisions of D'Erlon's men occupied it beyond the Nive, in front of the Ustaritz, and as far as Cambo; the remainder being in reserve, occupying a strong range of heights in front of Mousserolles, stretching from Villefranque on the Nive almost to Old Moguerre on the Adour. The great advantage of this position, was, that the troops, in case of disaster, might securely find refuge under the cannon of Bayonne; while the general-in-chief, having an interior and protected line of communication through that fortress, could at pleasure, like Napoleon at Dresden, throw the weight of his forces from one flank to another, when unforeseen and unguarded against, upon the enemy (5).

⁽¹⁾ Wellington to Lord Bathurst, Nov. 27, 1813. Gurw. xi. 327. Nap. vi. 424, 434.
(2) Viet. ct Conq. xxii. 291. Nap. vi. 368, 369.

⁽³⁾ Vict. et Conq. xxii. 290, 291.. Nap. vi. 369. 370. Belm. i. 269, Pellot, 79, 80.

His political. But although, in a military point of view, the position of Soult a ment , mas thus favourable, his political situation was very ilifferent, and if required all his perseverance, and vigour of administrative powers, to make head ogainst the difficulties which were hourly accumulating round the sinking empire. His soldiers though depressed by defeat, were still brave and doesle, it was the difficulty of procuring supplies which was the real eril; it was the system of making war maintain war, which now pressed with terrible but just severity nn the falling state. Money there was none to be got from headquarters in Paris, and the usual resource of the imperial government on such emergencies to levy contributions, however narmly and unvnimously approved of so long as they were laid on other countries, was now complained of as the most intolerable of all grievances when they fell upon themselves. Nor is it surprising that this universal indignation burst forth when the imperial system of government came to be really felt in France itself, for we have the authority of official documents for the ossertion, that in Navarre, for some years before the French were driven out of the country, the requisitions had often amounted to two hundred per cent of the whole income of the landowners and farmers. So oppressive were the exactions of the French authorities felt to be, that numbers migrated into the British lines. where they not only were subjected to no such hardens, but found a real and well paid market for all their commodutes. An official letter written from Bay onne at this period said, "The English general's policy, and the good discipline he maintains, does us more harm than ten battles-every peasant wishes to be under his protection " The conscripts raised in all the southern proxiners nere indeed marched in great numbers into Bayonne, but the ancient spirit of the imperial armies was gone, they deserted by bumilreds at a time, although every possible care was taken to treat them with gentleness, to spare their literpersenced frames, and to set them only ou duty in the interior of the fortress(1) Having taken his resolution to force his adversary's position in front of layonne, Wellington made the following dispositions for first, fifth, and light divisions, landelene's eavalry and twelve gine, in all twenty-four thousand combitants, were to drive back the I rench advanced posts along the whole front of the intrenched camp from the Aire to the sea On the right, Sir Rowland Hill with the second and Portuguese divisions, Vivian and Victor Alten's cavalry, and Ross's horse artillery, was to put I imself in motion In the night between the 8th and 9th, so as to pass the Aire 1 ; the forils of Cambo at daybreak on the latter day, and advance by the great road from St -Pred-de-lort towards I ayonne. At the same time beresford, in the centre, with the third and sixth divisions, was to cross the bire by bridges to be thrown over it during the night, while the fourth an I seventh divisions were to be in reserve a little in the rear, concealed from the energy, but ready to support any part of the line which might require it. The main attack was to be made by the centre and right, the principal object of the advance by Hope on the left, was to acquire an accurate view of the nature of the enemy's works between beyonne and the sea on the lawer to our Wellington's object in these movements was not to free the intrembed camp before baronue, which, from its being under the guns of that fe tress, could not be effected without very leavy loss, but to rive fir right upon the Adour, after crossing the Aire, whereby if e ecemy, afres by d sterior ! for provisions, would lose the means of communication with the interpr by the aid of that river, and would be compelled to fall back to other and more distant quarters, from which to draw his resources (1).

The requisite preparatory movements having been made with the Nice in the French perfect accuracy on the night of the 8th, a huge fire, lighted on a height behind Cambo at daybreak on the 9th, gave the signal of attack. The French had broken down the bridges at Ustaritz in the centre; but the island which connected them was in the possession of the British, and the passage was immediately forced under cover of a heavy fire of artillery, and D'Armagnac's division, which lay opposite, driven back by the sixth division. At the same time, Hill's troops, under the cover of artillery, forced the passage on the right above and below Cambo, and drove the French left wing back on the great road from St.-Jean Pied-de-Port to Bayonne. With such vigour was this onset made, that Foy, who commanded in that quarter was senarated from his men, and driven across the fields, with a few followers, towards Hasparen. No sooner, however, did the French troops behold the bale-fire lighted behind Cambo, than they all flew to arms, and Abbe's division, which was nearest, soon joined Foy's men, and their united . forces took a position on a range of heights running parallel to the Adonr, with Villefranque on their right. At the same time Hope with the left wing, moved forward by the great road from St.-Jean de Luz towards Bayonne; drove in all the enemy's advanced posts after a vigorous resistance, and approached so near to his intrenchments under that fortress, as completely to achieve the object entrusted to him in the general plan of operations. Shortly after noon, the Portuguese of the sixth division having come up, Hill attacked D'Armagnac's troops at Villefranque and the heights adjoining, and after some sharp fighting, and one repulse, drove them out of the former, and established himself in strength on the latter, the French retiring, amidst a heavy rain, by deep and almost impassable roads, towards Bayonne (2).

The passage of the Nive was now forced, the French left driven plan for under the cannon of Bayonne, and the English general established retrieving in a position from whence he could at pleasure, by a slight extenhis affins sion of his right, intercept the navigation of the Upper Adour, the great artery by which the French army was supplied, and the chief object of the attack to cut off. But though this passage had thus been surprised, and the operations successful, his situation had become one of no inconsiderable peril. The Nive, flowing in an oblique direction from south-east to northwest, cut his army in two; while Soult with his troops concentrated in the intrenched camp, and enjoying ample means of communicating at pleasure, by the bridges of Bayonne, from the one bank to the other, might, unknown to the Allies, throw the weight of his forces on either half of their army, when deprived of the means of co-operation from the other. He immediately resolved to take advantage of this singular good fortune, and did so with an ability and decision which would have done honour to Napoléon himself. During the night he drew back the whole of his troops into the intrenched camp, yielding thus to the Allies the ground they had won on his left, and permitting them to extend themselves to the Adour, and intercept his principal communications by that river. But while thus abandoning in appearance the whole objects of the contest, he was preparing a blow which was calculated to effect, and had wellnigh produced, a total change in the fortunes of the.

⁽¹⁾ Wellington to Lord Bathurst, Dec. 14, 1813. Gurw. M., 365. Murray's Gen. Orders in Wyld, 147. Wellington to Sir J. Nope, Dec. 9, 1813. Wyld, 150.

⁽²⁾ Wellington to Lord Bathurst. Dec. 14, 1813. Gurw. xi. 365, 366. Nap. vi. 373, 374. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 291, 292.

campaign. He gave orders in the night for the whole troops to hold themsches in readmest to start at daylight; and early on the morning of the 10th he issued forth on the left of the Aire, with nearly his whole disposable forces—after providing for the defence of the intrenched camp and the fortress—about sixty thousand strong, to assail one half of the Allies, not mustering more than thirty thousand combatants (1).

this first at daylight this formidable apparition hurst upon the British left, the British his and hy which such an onset, after the success of the preceding day, was this pred wholly unsuspected, Hope's troops, with the exception of Wilson's Portuguese, deeming the contest over, lad retired to their cantons.

Derion Portuguese, deeming the contest over, had retured to their earton-ments; the first division was at St.-Jean de Luz, six miles from the outposts; the light division had orders to reture from Bussussary to Arbonne, but had fortunately not begun to more, nearly four miles in the rear; and the fifth division was near Bidart, so that the troops were scattered in a way of all others the most favourable for being cut up in detail. The British brigades which were left in front, occupied indeed a strong position, stretching along Vendee, only by narrow and deep roads, was very susceptible of defence; but the risk was extreme that the light division, not more than six thousand in number, would be crushed before any surcour could arrive for its support. The chateau and church of Areangues, and the village of the same name, constituted strong points of defence; and three tonciues of land extended from its front to the northward by which the enemy must approach; they were held by the 52d, the pickets of the 15d, and the biffemen, while the valleys between them were clothed with copes woods, which were almost impeneitable. Intrencliments had been ordered to be constructed on a great scale, to strengthen this part of the position; but they were only traced ont, and the fourth division, the near-est support, was several mules in rear of the light (2).

In these circumstances, if Soult had adhered to his original derom stret sign of massing his whole army together on the platean of Pussusaccount sary, and falling nt once on the light division at Arcangues, it must Inevitably have been destroyed. But in the night he changed his plan, and, instead of concentrating his force on one point, divided it into two corps, the one of which, under Clausel, advanced against triangues, while the off er, led by Reille, moved against Hope by the great road to the Pidassoa. A heavy ram fell in the night; and it was some time after disbreak ere the energy, whose tast accumulation of force in front of Arrangues was wholls ursuspected, were observed to Ie hilling the Ledgerows, and sliently stealing up the wooded inflows in front of Arrangues Lempt, who was with the pickets, re somer observed these aminous symptoms, than I agave orders to eccupy il e church and village with his reserves, and there was lovely time to everplete these preparations when the enemy were upon them. Inning from the words and the bollows with four cries, ar half if e restored confidence of the tory, the trench fell upon the plekets on all the torgres of land in freet of Arcangues in overwhelming numbers, and the assured antergation of succe ress. To maintain their ground against such rast of is, would have express! If emiches to certain destruction, and the Sal, 131, and fifer, with a forturnese regiment, fill swillly list along the timzues for above a min file of

If the further to find $ form the $1.500 in the $150 in $1.500 in all the way; but no sooner had they reached the open ground at their extremity in front of Arcangnes, than these incomparable troops suddenly united their seemingly routed bodies, faced about, and presented an impenetrable front to their pursuers. The French, with loud cries, and extraordinary enthusiasm at their now unwonted success, advanced to the attack, and Soult brought up a battery of twelve guns directly in front of Arcangues, which opened a heavy cannonade on the church and village; but the 43d, Rifles, and Portuguese, by an incessant and well-directed fire of small arms, made good their post, while the 52d held the open ground on the left, towards the great road, with invincible courage (1).

Bloody con. While this desperate conflict was going on in the centre, in front niet on the of Arcangues, a still more sanguinary and doubtful fight had com-Barronilliet, menced on the left, at Barronilliet. There the attack was so wholly unexpected, that the first division and Lord Aylmer's brigade were at St.-Jean de Luz and Bidart, six miles in the rear, when the action commenced about nine o'clock. At that hour, Reille with two divisions attacked a Portugnese brigade in Anglet, the advanced post of the left, and soon drove them out of that village, and pursued them with heavy loss to the ridge of Barronilhet, where they rallied on Robinson's brigade of the fifth division, and stood firm. A confused but desperate and bloody conflict immediately ensued along the whole line in that quarter, as the assailants, hot and vigorous with their success, pushed through the openings in the hedges, at some places successful, in others vigorously repulsed. But by degrees the troops from the rear came up; Lord Aylmer's brigade of the Guards, and Bradford's Portuguese, arrived in breathless haste, and relieved Robinson's men, who by this time had suffered severely; and Sir John Hope, who received a severe contusion, with his whole staff, set a noble example of ability, coolness, and devoted valour. Thus time was gained, and meanwhile Wellington, who during the night of the 9th had been on the right bank of the Nive, alarmed by the heavy fire on his left, repaired in person at daybreak to the threatened side of the river, and made the third and sixth divisions cross; while Beresford threw another bridge to facilitate the passage. As soon as he arrived near Arcangues, and saw how matters stood, he ordered up in addition the fourth and seventh divisions; and the sight of these imposing masses, which now appeared on the field, so disconcerted Soult, that he snspended all further attacks, and both parties rested on their arms on the field of battle. Just before dark, however, the two fresh divisions of Taupin and Maransin having arrived in the centre, Clausel made a fresh attack on the village of Areangues, and the Allies were so worn out and reduced in number by incessant fighting all day, that the village and mayor's chateau were both carried; the Portuguese broke and fled, and some of the British regiments began to waver. At that moment, Wellington himself rode up to the troops at the foot of the church-"You must keep your ground, my lads," eried he; "there is nothing behind you-charge!" Instantly a loud shout was raised; the fugitives on the flank rallied and reformed line; a volley was poured in, the bayonets levelled, and the enemy were driven, still obstinately fighting, out of the village and chateau, which remained in possession of the British, as one bull, his horns close locked in his adversary's, is fairly mastered and pushed back by the superior strength of his antagonist (2).

Gurw ni. 367, 368. Nap. vi. 365, 386. Gleig's Subaltern, 188, 189. Vict, et Conq. xxii, 294, 295.

⁽¹⁾ Wellington to Lord Bathuist, 14th Dec. 1813. Gurw. xi. 367. Subaltern, 183, 185. Nap. vi. 381, 383. Vict. et Conq. xxii. 294.

(2) Wellington to Lord Bathurst, Dec. 14, 1813.

Pellot, 83, 84.

Soult's blow, ably conceived and brively executed, had now been man reast pease delivered, and failed, the attack of his concentrated masses on the over to the allied left had been met and driven back by a small part only of the British force. But that indefaugable officer did not yet hold furnself beat, instead of being disconcerted by his repulse, he immediately set about fresh combinations to recall victory to his standards. But in the night a disheartening reverse occurred, strikingly characteristic of the sinking fortunes of Aspokon Two German regiments, one of lassau and one of Frankfort, came over to the Albe-, and were received with unbounded joy, drums beating and arms presented by the Pritish battalions, who were drawn up to receive them They a command of their prince, verers on the libine, non-

army to do the same Several other German regiments were in Catalonia, and both generals immediately sent advices of what had occurred to the rival chiefs in that province-the one hoping to profit, the other to take warning from the occurrence Before the intelligence arrived, however, Suchet had already, by the Emperor's orders, disarmed the troops of that nation, two thousand four hundred strong, in his arms -with a heavy heart, for they were among the best soldiers he had so that they were merely lost to the French, but not gained to the Albes Those which joined Wellington were Immediately embarked at Jean de Luz, and soon after rejoined the ranks of their countrymen on the lanks of the Rhine (1),

The forenoon of the day following, the 11th, passed without any considerable action, but about two o'clock Wellington ordered the 9th regiment to make a reconnoissance on the left towards Pucho, which led to a sharp shirmish at that point, in which the 9th, being at first unsupported, was at first worsted, but at length, with difficulty, brought off by the ail of some

Pritish position before they were ready to receive them, and a contisen action began with great animosity in the village of larrounthet and adjoining wood General Hope, however, soon came up with the 8th regiment, and that noble officer, whose overflowing courses ever led him to the front, where the fire was hottest and the danger greatest, was to be seen among if e troops, his lofty figure overtopping all the motier throng with which I e was surrounded, animating his men by his voice an I example (2) I r great exertions he at length restored order, an I the enemy were reputed, with a less of about six hundred on each sile, but the fifth dirivin, being tow exhausted with fatigue, an I much reduced in numbers, was reheard to the test in the front of the position (7) militaries one se fine. Tong s. [1.1 for $1]*

I se 31. I'd The status I is includedly please in presed on their hard to his includedly

I a marker bushess, some an energy to have by the

⁽¹⁾ We arm to land College, 14 b Der 1813 Car with a feet or found by the form of to al principal state of the p of a chieve of trade t or sequence, I trines a bibe whole board and every des saturates Translates which approach, and an other to be a for which had be not by the man of the haden of all had great majors, he had all flyations, he made and his paramet he are noted to be he had be-fore. of the seatest to the ten a the man of the security (t * = + tel alt Rabill Balle ma Lart La hord, $14 Eme Stell, bere d. 2 2

Soult passes over again to attack that hundred men on each side, took place on the 12th; and Soult, seeon the right of the Nive. ing that the bulk of the enemy's forces were now concentrated and the left of the Adour, resolved to renew his attack on the British right, under Hill, on the right bank of that river. With this view, in the night of the 12th. he again drew the bulk of his forces through Bayonne; and leaving only two divisions and Villate's reserve in the intrenched camp on the left bank of the Nive, crossed over with seven divisions to the right bank, in order to crush Hill, who had now two divisions only and some brigades-in all fourteen thousand combatants with fourteen guns, in that quarter. The advantages of the French marshal's position singularly favoured this operation; for his internal line of communication, from the one bank to the other, by the bridge of boats above Bayonne, was three quarters of a league only in length, while Wellington's, on the outer circle, was no less than three leagues. In this way he succeeded, before daylight on the 15th, in placing thirty-five thousand combatants in Hill's front on the right of the Nive at ST.-PIERRE, while seven thousand more menaced his rear. In expectation of this attack, Wellington ordered the sixth division to cross at daylight again to the right of the Nive, and the fourth division, and a part of the third, were soon after moved in the same direction, by the bridge which Beresford had thrown across two days before; while a division of Gallicians were brought forward to St.-Jean de Luz, and one of Andalusians from the Bastan to the rear of the British army at Itzassu, and fed from the British magazines; but before any of these succours approached, Hill had, by the native valour of his men, defeated the whole efforts of his antagonists, three times more numerous than themselves (1).

His force was stationed on both sides of the high-road from Ba-Position of Hill's corps. yonne to St.-Pied-de-Port, and occupied a line about two miles in length. The centre, consisting of Ashworth's Portuguese and Barnes' British brigade, was strongly posted on a rugged conical height, one side of which was broken with rocks and brushwood, while the other was closed in by high and thick hedges, with twelve guns pointing directly down the great road by which the enemy were to advance. The left, under Pringle, occupied a wooded and broken ridge, in the middle of which was the old chateau of Villefranque; the right, under Byng, was posted on the ridge of Vieux Moguerre, nearly parallel to the Adour. The French occupied with their pickets a range of counter-heights, nearly parallel, at the distance of about a mile. Between the two armies was a wide valley or basin, open, and commanded in every part by the allied guns; while the roads were too deep, and the soil too wet, for the action of cavalry. The position was intersected in its centre by the great road to St.-Pied-de-Port, as that at Waterloo by the chaussée leading through la Belle-Alliance to Charleroi. The beavy rains during the night so swelled the Nive, that Beresford's bridge of boats was swept away; and though it was soon restored next morning, yet during the early and most critical period of the action, Ilill's corps was entirely separated from the remainder of the army (2).

A thick mist on the morning of the 15th, enabled Soult to form his columns of attack unperceived by his adversary, and they were extremely formidable. In front, on the great road, came D'Erlon, leading on D'Armagnac's, Abbê's, and Daricau's infantry, with a large body of cavalry and twenty-two guns; next came Foy's and Maransin's inen, and behind the other two divisions in reserve. These large and dark masses, closely grouped together on the highroad and fields immediately adjoining, at one time entirely shrouded in mist, at another dimly descried through openings of the vapour, seemed of portentous magnitude. With danuless hearts, however, the hithe army of the Hitish theheld the Imposing array, albeit well aware that the bridge of the Nive had been such away, and that no succour would be obtained till the day was far spent. At half-past eight the sun broke forth; Soult immediately pushed forward his light troops, and drove in the silied pickets in the centre, which fell back towards St.-Pierre. Able attacked them with great vigour; D'Armagnae, standing off to the left, directed his troops against Vieux Mogerre and Byng's men; the spathing line of line soon crept up the slopes on either side of the basin, and the more distantials recedioed with the roar of forty guns, which were worked with extended his two distantials are considered.

⁽¹⁾ Wellington to Lord Bathurst, 14th Dec. 1813.

Gurw. xi. 369. Nap. vi. 389, 392, Vict, et Conq. xxii. 297.

Xxii. 296, Pellot, 84, 85,

Abbe's onset in the centre was pushed with such energy, that be flore. Asknorth's Portuguese were soon driven in; and the Tist, which ment danger were sent with two guns to their aid, were likewise forced to give ground; but the folth having advanced to their support, the French in their turn were repulsed. The enemy upon this brought up a strong battery of cannon, which played on the British centre with such effect that it was seriously weakened; and Abbe, seeing the Impression, pushed forward a deep and massy column, which advanced with great vigour, in spite of a crashing cannonade which fore its front and flanks, drove back the Portugueso and Both, and won the crest of the bill in the centre l'arnes upon this brought up the Old Highlanders, who were in reserve behind St. Pierry; and that noble corns, charging down the highway, soon cleared away the skirmlshers on either side, and driving home, met the shock of two trench regiments which were advancing up the convenay, but which soon wavered, broke, and fled, closely followed by the mountain plumes. Soult immediaately advanced his guns on either side, the shot from which planard through "---- . I the fresh regiments were brought up to alour, the Highlinders were unable. The French corps in front advanced steadily forward with admirable resonation, and the 12th were borne lark desperately fighting, but in disorder, to their old ground leabled 52 Pierre. The Portuguese gins upon this force hark to avaid being taken if a French skirnishers every where crowded forward to the summit. Direct fell, bodly wounded; the Portuguese gunners, who had remmed their seed fell, bodly wounded; the Portuguese gunners, who had remmed their seed in the rear, fell of 15th bedde their pieces that their fire was alrest extinguished. The 71st were willidarant four the fold, goad ing their teeth with indiguation at being taken out of the builte; the 7th, on the roth, it is the fire with the above those above and pieces of D'Armagnac; nothing but the thick he feel with a fire out to

So sooner did line, who had to ⁽il) Species 3200. But of Conf. on h. 2200. M. Beigneift conf. 27, 37 mg on 30. 100. Police 43.

whence he could survey the whole field of battle, behold the critical position of the centre and right, and especially the retreat of the 71st and 5d regiments, than he descended from his eminence, and in person led on one brigade of Le Cor's Portuguese infantry to support Barnes' men in the centre, while the other was dispatched to aid the right on Vieux Moguerre against D'Armagnac. Meanwhile, the right wing of the 50th, and Ashworth's Cacadores, spread out as skirmishers behind the impenetrable hedge, and still with the most heroic courage made good their post; the 92d in consequence had time to re-form behind St.-Pierre; and their gallant colonel, Cameron, led them again down the road with colours flying and music playing. At this sight the skirmishers on the flanks again rushed forward; the French tirailleurs were in their turn driven back, and the 92d charged at a rapid pace down the highway, until they met the solid column of French infantry, in all the pride of victory, marching up. For a moment the dense mass stood firm; a shock with crossed bayonets seemed inevitable, when suddenly the enemy wheeled about and retired across the valley to their original position, hardly pursued by the victors, who were so thoroughly exhausted with their desperate encounter as to be ready to drop down with fatigue. At the same time, the brave 71st, indignant at being withdrawn from the fight, returned to aid the tartan plumes with such alacrity, and were so gallantly supported by Le Cor's Portuguese, headed by Hill and Stewart, that the enemy on the right centre also were overthrown, though not without heavy loss, among whom was Le Cor himself, who fell severely wounded (1).

Progress of While this terrible conflict was going forward in the centre, D'Arthe britle on the two magnac, on the British right, with the aid of six pieces of horse artillery, had all but earried the ridge of Vieux Mognerre, where Byng bravely struggled against vastly superior forces. But just as that division, with Foy's, which had now also come up, had established themselves on the summit, and appeared in threatening masses on the right of the British centre, the brigade of Portuguese, so opportunely detached by Hill, arrived in double quick time to their support. These admirable troops, ascending the reverse slope of the ridge under a raking fire from the French guns, now established on the summit, succeeded in rallying the 5d regiment; and both united, charged again up the hill with the utmost gallantry, and with loud shouts won the top. At the same time, Soult was obliged to withdraw D'Armagnac's reserve to support Abbé in the centre; and Byng, now more feebly opposed, succeeded in re-establishing himself in a solid manner on the Partouhiria range. Meanwhile Daricau, on the British left, maintained a brave and balanced contest on the hills of Villefranque with Pringle's brigade, who stoutly stood their ground; but the repulse of Abbé, in the centre, rendered it impossible for the gallant Frenchman to maintain the advanced position he had attained, and his own losses having been very severe, he was obliged to fall back, like the rest, to his original position on the other side of the basin (2).

Thus the victory was complete at all points before the other diton with the visions came up from the left bank of the Nive; but at half-past of twelve the sixth division, which had marched without intermispletes the sixth division, which had marched without intermisvictory. sion since daylight, and crossed by the re-established bridge of boats behind Villefranque, appeared, led on by Wellington in person, in imposing strength, on the mount in the rear from which Hill had descended;

and they were soon followed by the fourth and third divisions, and some bricades of the seventh, who were seen hurrying forward in great haste from the bridge. At this joyful sight, the wearied British, forgetting their fatigues, resumed the offensive at all points. Buchan and Dyna's brigades, with load cheers, hurled D'Armagnae and Foy's divisions down the Partonbina clope, and the centre rushing impetuously forward, enveloped and carried all the advanced positions still held by the enemy in front of St.-Pierre, taking ton guns, which had galled them excessively from the beginning of the tight, In vain Soult hurried to the front, and, exposing his life like the meanest of his follower, be ought his men by the remembrance of their past glories, and the sight of the present dangers of their country, to return to the charge Nothing could withstand the onward movement of the British; and t'e French, hallled at all points, recoiled to the ground they had held before the action commenced. The battle non died away, first to a decliming interchange of nur-ketry, and then to a distant cannonade; and before night, Soult, de-pairing of success in any further attacks, withdrew his troops into the intrenched camp, and himself crossed with Foy's director to the right bank of the Adour, to guard against any attempts on the part of the enemy to cross that important river (1).

This desperate battle, one of the most bloody and Lard fought metalien which had occurred in the whole course of the Pennantar war, cost the British two thousand fire hundred, and the French three thousand men. The total loss of the Alber, from the time when the russes of the Aire commenced, was an hundred and fifty killed, three thousand nor hundred and seven wounded, and five hundred and four prisoners; in all five thousand and nineteen, and this included five generals, Hope, Holinson, Barnes, le Cor, and Ashnorth, wounded: a clear proof of the obstinate nature of the conflict, and of the stern necessity which had compelled the chiefs to expose themselves as much as the humblest soldiers. The French lost six thou and men, killed or wounded, on the field, besides two guns, the handearned troplaces of the fight at St -Pierre; including the German troops who came over on the night of the 10th, they were nealened by eight thousand fire handred men But, what was of still more importance, il ey had lost the object for which they fought; the Alberhad crossed the Nive, and were established in strength on the left bank of the upper Adour, the navigation of that river was intercepted; and Soult, with all the advantage of an intereched camp and fattree in his rear, with an interior and central | perf emminimisation for his troops, had not only been madle to obtain any directive advantage over the pertions of the alhed army which he had sucremisely as-. deprived of he principal inc

While the French arms, cooped up in its interest edeae p. wir deprivate all communication on either size by the strong, and driven for their form and support upon the vast and desolate Indicated actions, there are support upon the vast and desolate Indicated actions, and support upon the vast and desolate Indicated actions, and support upon the vast and table in the property of the support upon the land carriage, and such a support upon the Princh troops, come entably established in troops, 31 d and 124, 413

the other towns on the coast, drew ample supplies from the sea on the one side, and the rich fields of Bearn, the birthplace of Henry IV and the garden of France, on the other. St.-Jean de Luz was declared a free port, and by a special proclamation protection was afforded to all vessels, even French, which had been or might be found in the Nivelle or the Adour, or in any harbours on the coast of France. By these wise and disinterested measures, joined to the admirable discipline established among his troops, and which he rigorously maintained, and their constant payment for every thing in ready money (1), Wellington indeed deprived himself of much prize-money, which would otherwise have fallen to his lot (2); but he secured ample supplies of all sorts for his soldiers. The harbour of St.-Jean de Luz was speedily crowded with the pendants of all nations, wafting in profusion every thing requisite for the maintenance of his army; while the peasants of Bearn brought their produce more regularly to the British market than they had ever done to that of Bayonne. This admirable conduct indeed proved a severe drain upon the British finances, especially as all the payments required to be made in specie; it threw the army in consequence seven months into arrear, and accumulated debt to an immense amount in every part of the Peninsula; but Wellington and the government had the firmness to adhere to it with scrupulous fidelity under every difficulty, and their constancy was not without its reward. It entirely stopped the growth of a national war in the south of France, which the pillage of the Spaniards at one period was beginning to excite; it sent the conscripts home by thousands from the tricolor standards; and by the prodigious contrast which it afforded to the ruinous requisitions of Napolcon, contributed to prepare that general indignation at his government, which so soon after hurled him from the throne (5).

Reflections on the battles in front of Bayonne afford one of the most remarkable examples which the whole annals of war have preserved, of the front of Bayonne. importance of an interior line of communication, and the prodigious effect which the skilful use of that advantage can afford in the hands of an able general. Like Napoléon around Mantua in 4796, or in the plains of Champagne in 1814, Soult contrived by means of this circumstance, with an army inferior upon the whole to that of his adversary, to be always superior at the point of attack; and such was the weight of the columns which he thus hurled in succession at different parts of the British force, that he more than

(1) "I do not believe that the union of the two nations depends on pillage; but if it does, I declare for one, that I desire neither the command nor the continuation of such a bond, founded on plunder. I have lost twenty thousand men in this campaign; and I have not done so in order that either General Murillo, or any other general, should come here to pillage the French peasants; and as long as I command I will not permit it. If you are resolved to pillage, look out for another commander than me; for as long as I am at its head, I declare aloud I will not permit it. You have large armies in Spain; if you desire to plunder, take away the command from me. Enter France, and I will withdraw into Spain; you know well you would be driven out in fitteen days; having neither magazines, money, nor any thing requisite to carry on a campaign. France, rich as it is, would never maintain your troops if it is given up to plunder; even those who go on the principle of levying contributions to make war maintain war, are well aware that the first thing to do is to stop private disorders. I am the best friend of the soldiers and their real interests, when I prevent them from destroying both by pillage. I could also say something in justification of my conduct on political considerations; but I have said enough, and I repeat it. I am altogether indifferent whether I command a large or a small army; bot, be it large or small, it must obey me, and there must be no pillage."—Wellington to General Munillo, 24th Dec. 1813. Gorwood, xi. 396.

(2) "The proclamation which I issued, declaring that private property should be respected on entering France, has been applied by their owners to the vessels taken in the Nivello and the Adour; and though I had not such an application in my contemplation when I issued it, yet, as far as I am concerned, who in personal interest may be considered a principal party, I am desirous for the general good that it should be sn applied, and that the owners of the vessels should retain their property. If the law-officers of the Crown construct he proclamation otherwise, as applying only to property ashore, I request the authority of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent to issue another proclamation, to protect the vessels found in the rivers and ports of France belonging to persons remaining in these houses, as described in my proclamation of November last."—Wellington to Earle Bathurs, 8th Jan. Genvood, xi. 423, 424.

(3) Wellingion to Lord Bathurst, Jan. 8, 1814.

Gurw. xi. 423, 425.

once all but gained a decisive advantage, and reft from Wellington the fruitofall his conquests beyond the Eprinsh frontiers. This close approximate to success, also, was attained with troops disheartened by long-continued defeat, and against an enemy flushed with an unparalleled series of victories, and against a commander who overe was outdone in the earreity with which he divinced the intentions of his opponent, and the rapidity with which he moved his forces to counteract them. On the other hand, the altiumte defect of all these efforts, though planned with the utmost obihity, and executed wit surpassing gallantry by a comparatively small body of the allied troop proves what so many other events in the war conspire to demonstrate, the a certain degree of firmness in the generals, and courage in the troops, white are thus assailed by the powers of structegy, will generally counterlalance are thus assailed by the powers of structegy, will generally controllalance after the advantages, and that it is to the want of these qualities among his opponents, as much as his on a genus, that the trumpits of Vapoleon in Itsi and Champagne are to be aserbed hadrager Soult's conduct in the campaign, from the time that he assumed resulted the terminand in the middle of July, was a model, so far as it may be a model, and the command in the middle of July, was a model, so far as it may be a model to the commander of the french army, excepting the Imperior, could, with the same means, have made it resistance equally obstinate and protracted. When it is recollected, that when he took the command of the army in the middle of July at Bayonne, he found it routed and disorganized, and in such a state of depression as to localmost unequal to any active operations, and that in the end of December he was still under the wills of the same fortress, after having, in the hierrening period, fought seven pitched battles, and sustained a loss of thrive thousaid men, it must be admitted that a more glorious example of tenacious resolution and patientle resistance is not to be net with its the long an Implancholy annals of military exploits. Its immediate resumption of the offensive, and a livance towards.

much visuar at Sauroren on the Lith Juny, or an assurant of SI-Prefre on the 45th December, as he showed ability to the previous on expirion of the movements which led to these bottles, the result might have been different, and the British arms been rolled back with defeat bel in 1 the Phro

The campaign of Vittoria is the most glorious, both in a moral and the assession political point of stew, which is to be found in the Lutudiannals stress. When we reflect that at its recommencement the inglish faces were still on the Cox and the Lyueda, and the Frenc'i armice occupied meet that one half of Spain, including the whole of its northern fortnesses, and that at its conclusion they had been wholly expelled from by and, if or contail arrow of the Pyrenees forced, and their troops maintaining a panful of our expansion on the lands of the Adouc-Hi is lated to any whether well seen it cause to admire the about of the daily of the other who if they do not a time, action in an aralleled successes—the Lindd sed of the solders who if they do they unnearted, through such tools at I dangers, or the strength of the action which, in so brief a space, produced such astemblying reads. They

Sept. 22 to a regularity

448

But there is one glory connected with the Peninsular war, whire with which British empire shares with no other power, and which the bic. pher of Wellington is entitled to claim as exclusively his ow the contest. During all the difficulties of the contest, and in the millst of the most overwhelming embarrassments which arose from the long continua; and oppressive burdens of the war, England never adopted the odious rev lutionary principle, of drawing the resources for the contest from the count in which it was carried on; and from first to last firmly, to her own great is mediate loss, repudiated the maxim that war should maintain war. Whate she did, she did with her own forces and from her own means alone; no a raged country had to rue the day when her standards appeared among the no wasted realm showed where her armies had been; no tears of the fathe and the widon, mourning cold-blooded massacres, dimmed the lustre o victories. If disorders occurred, as occur they did, and occur they will, it w against her system of warfare, and despite the utmost efforts of her chic With unconquerable constancy, Wellington and the British Governme adhered to this noble system, in the midst of pecuniary difficulties whiwould have crushed any other man, and financial embarrasements which would have overwhelmedany other nation. During all this time, Napoleon generals and armies were revelling in wealth and affluence, and I rance live was enjoying comparatively light taxation, the fruit of the unbounded t systematic extortion which they practised in all the countries which the armies occupied. But mark the end of these things, and the final opposit effect of the gains of oppression and the rule of justice upon the fortunes (nations. Napoleon, driven with desgrace behind the libline and the Perener was unable to protect even the mighty empire he ruled from the aroused an universal indignation of mankind; while Wellington, commencing from sun I wanter fat of forms I need with on preenhelmine force, through the make a fiber of the transfer the court of south the time to have bettern concept to the first and one taken

END OF TOLLHE MINTE.